The success which attended Major Henderson's operations induced a neighbouring proprietor to commence feuing, and this petition stated that he also, in the course of the last year or two, had disposed of various portions of his ground; and in the event of any interruption to the feuing on Westerton, he would be in a position to supply the demands for feus, to the manifest deterioration of the estate under the petitioner's charge.

Several transactions relating to feus had been entered into, but the necessary deeds had not been executed before Major Henderson's illness, and since the petitioner's appointment, he had received applications for feus from various parties. He now therefore prayed for special powers, (1), to complete the whole transactions entered into by Major Henderson before his incapacity to manage his own affairs commenced; and, (2), to grant feus of such portions of the estate as were laid out on Major Henderson's plan for feuing, and in terms of his conditions of feu, and to enter and receive vassals, their heirs and assignees.

The Lord Ordinary reported the case on 27th February 1857, expressing himself in favour of granting the first branch of the special powers craved; and stating farther, that it was expedient that the farther powers asked should also be granted, if the Court would interfere on mere ground of expediency.

Forman, for the petitioner.—There is no decision that it is incompetent to grant the powers craved. It is not here proposed to originate anything, but only to carry out what the proprietor himself had begun, and what promised great benefit to the estate, and as to which the whole expense has been already incurred, and would prove fruitless if the powers were not granted.

LORD PRESIDENT.—We are not told what is the extent of this estate, nor the effect which the operations already completed have had upon it. It is material to know whether this is a small property which might have made a good farm, but which, for agricultural purposes, is now destroyed, or whether this is a large estate upon a mere corner of which these feuing operations have been commenced, and which has not yet been deteriorated in its agricultural value. According to the view I take of it, this case stands in a middle position between what has been found competent and what has been found incompetent, and it may depend on all these considerations whether we can determine the propriety or legal competency of granting this petition. I see, however, no objection to granting the power of completing the transactions referred to in the first part of the prayer of the petition.

The rest of the Court concurred.

The powers first prayed for were accordingly granted.

The Lord Ordinary again reported the case of this date. It now appeared as the result of a remit by his Lordship to Mr Curror, that the whole lands of Westerton extended to 280 acres, of which 231 acres were laid out for feuing; that the ground already feued amounted to 36 acres; that the value of the estate was diminished for agricultural purposes, and that its future value

No. 195. "would be seriously affected if the feuing operations were suspended." It was suggested that a portion of the lawn and of the woods nearest the mansion-house, which were embraced in the feuing plan, ought to be reserved at present. The curator restricted his application in accordance with that suggestion, and, under this limitation, the Court granted the second branch of the prayer of the petition.

June 26, 1857.
Colvin v.
Short.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Grant powers to the curator to grant new feus in the portions of the said lands and estates of Westerton and Coneyhill, mentioned in the note specified by Mr Curror in his report, and extending to 51.344 acres, and marked out by him on the plan in process by being coloured red, and to execute all deeds and writings, and do all acts necessary for carrying out the feuing of the said lands and estates to the extent foresaid, and also to enter vassals and grant renewals of the rights and titles in their favour, as craved in the Note, No. 26 of process, and decern."

JOHN N. FORMAN, W.S.—Agent.

No. 196. WILLIAM COLVIN, Pursuer and Respondent.—Penney—N. C. Campbell
WILLIAM SHORT AND COMPANY, Defenders and Advocators.—D. F. Inglis —Patton.

Sale—Delivery—Breach of contract.—A contract of sale of iron was entered into in Glasgow. The purchaser had a place of business in London;—the seller had not. The terms of payment were—"Cash in London on 23d November, in exchange for storekeeper's warrants." On 22d November, the seller despatched from Glasgow, by a post which arrived in London during business hours on the 23d, storekeeper's warrants and drafts for the price on the purchasers, and intimated to the purchasers by same post that they would be presented through one or other of two banks. The drafts were presented early on the morning of the 24th, and the purchasers refused to honour them;—Held, that time was of the essence of the contract, and that presentment not having been made on the 23d November, the contract was not binding after that date.

June 26, 1857. WILLIAM SHORT and COMPANY dishonoured drafts for the price of iron purchased by them from William Colvin, on the ground that the storekeeper's warrants had not been tendered in due time. Colvin then applied to the Sheriff of Lanarkshire for a warrant to sell the iron,—alleging in his petition that "the iron market is at present in a very fluctuating state, with a downward inclination." The warrant was granted, and the iron sold at a loss of upwards of L.400.

1st Division.
C.
Sheriff-court of Lanarkshire

Colvin now raised the present action, concluding to have Short and Company decerned to make payment, "1st, of the sum of L.454, 4s. 5d. sterling, being damages sustained by the pursuer in consequence of the defenders having violated a contract made by them with the pursuer for the purchase of 2000 tons of pig iron, on or about the 9th day of November 1853; and being also the difference or deficiency between the contract price of said 2000 tons of pig iron so bought by the defenders from the pursuer (but which price the defenders failed or refused to pay to the pursuer) and the price realised for the said 2000 tons of iron under a re-sale of the said iron, under and in terms of judicial authority; and, 2d, of the sum of L.42, 11s. 6d. sterling, being the amount of bank commission on the said transaction, and the expense of noting and protesting drafts for the amount of the contract price of said iron drawn by the pursuer upon and dishonoured by the defenders."

Short and Company denied all liability, in respect that (1) they were not principals, but had acted as brokers for parties whose names they disclosed, and (2) that the pursuer had failed duly to implement his part of the contract.

No. 196.
June 26, 1857.
Colvin v.
Short.

A proof was allowed, the import of which, and the whole facts of the case, were thus stated in the interlocutor of this Court recalling the interlocutors pronounced in the inferior Court:—“ Find it established as matter of fact that, on the 9th November 1853, the pursuer and defenders entered into a contract in Glasgow, by which the pursuer sold to the defenders 2000 tons of pig iron, at the price of 80s. 9d. per ton, to be paid by cash in London in exchange for storekeeper's warrants on the 23d November 1853; that no particular place in London was specified for making such exchange; and that the pursuer had no place of business in London, but that the defenders had a place of business at Newman's Court, Cornhill, London; 2d, That in this transaction the pursuer dealt with the defenders as principals, and that the defenders did not disclose to the pursuer that they were acting as agents for any third party; 3d, That the pursuer sent from Glasgow to London, through the Western Bank of Scotland, by the mail which left Glasgow on or about twenty minutes past seven o'clock on the evening of Tuesday the 22d November 1853, storekeeper's warrants for 2000 tons of pig iron, and also drafts upon the defenders for L.8075, being the price of said iron; 4th, That, at the same time, and by the same mail, the pursuer wrote the defenders' London house, advising them that he had sent said drafts, and that they would be presented either through the Union Bank of London or through Messrs Jones, Lloyd, and Company, but probably the former; 5th, That said drafts, and also warrants for the said iron, arrived at the Union Bank of London about twenty or twenty-five minutes after three o'clock on the afternoon of Wednesday the 23d November 1853, and that the said letter of advice was received by the defenders' said London house about the same time; 6th, That neither the said drafts nor the said warrants were presented to the defenders, or at their place of business, on the 23d November, nor was any communication made to them on the subject thereof by the Union Bank of London on that day; 7th, That the warrants and drafts were presented to the defender's London house on Thursday the 24th November about half-past ten o'clock forenoon, by the Union Bank of London, but that the defenders refused to receive the warrants or pay the drafts, which were on the same day noted and protested as against the defenders for non-payment; 8th, Find that the present action has been brought by the seller against the defenders for loss, damages, and expenses said to have been incurred by the seller in consequence of alleged violation by the defenders of the said contract of sale.”

The documents constituting the transaction were (1) a sale-note, as follows:—

“ No. 352.

Sold to Messrs William Short and Company, two thousand tons, $\frac{1}{2}$ No. 1, and $\frac{1}{2}$ No. 3, g. m. b. pig iron, at eighty shillings and ninepence sterling per ton. Terms of payment, cash in London on 23d instant, against storekeepers' warrants, f. o. b. here.

WILLIAM COLVIN.

Glasgow, 9th November 1853,	} and	80/9
		0/9 Brok ^e .
		<hr/> 81/6”

2. A bought-note, as follows:—

“ No. 352.

Glasgow, 9th November 1853.

Bought of William Colvin, Esq., two thousand tons, g. m. b. Scotch pig iron ($\frac{1}{2}$ th No. 1, and $\frac{1}{2}$ th No. 3), at eighty-one shillings and sixpence per ton, f. o. b. here.

No. 196. "Said iron to be paid for in cash (in London) on Wednesday 23d instant, in exchange for storekeepers' warrants, f. o. b.
 June 26, 1857.
 Colvin v.
 Short.

P. pro WM. SHORT & Co.
 CHARLES WENMAN."

3. A letter from the pursuer to the defenders, as follows:—

"Glasgow, 22d November 1853.

"DEAR SIRs,—I beg to annex invoice of 2000 tons m/n due in London to-morrow, for which I have passed orders on you per Western Bank, for L.4037, 10s. respectively, to which your attention will oblige. Am uncertain whether they shall be presented through the Union Bank, or Jones, Loyd, and Co., most probably the former.

"Our market has been inactive to-day, m/n warrants nominally 78/ cash. I am," &c. (Signed) "WILLIAM COLVIN."

4. Draft by the pursuer on the defenders, as follows:—

"Messrs Wm. Short & Co., London. Glasgow, 22d November 1853.

"DEAR SIRs,—On demand please pay to order of Union Bank of London Four thousand and thirty-seven pounds ten shillings sterling, against warrants herewith for one thousand tons m/n g. m. b. pig iron, as advised by, dear sirs, yours truly,

WILLIAM COLVIN."

"L.4037, 10s. sterling."

5. Letter of same date from the Western Bank of Scotland to the Union Bank of London, as follows:—

"We now transmit for our credit bills as described—value L.12,226. 13s. 3d., and we trouble you with six drafts for favour of acceptance and return." Amongst these were included the drafts above referred to.

In the course of his proof the pursuer sought to establish two points of usage of trade. 1. That in such contracts the custom of Glasgow merchants was to transmit to London the warrants by the evening post of the day before that fixed for the exchange. 2. That it was the usage for the party in London having notice that the storekeepers' warrants had been transmitted, to send for them, and not wait till they were presented.

The Sheriff-substitute (Smith) pronounced an interlocutor on 27th December 1854, in which, after several findings in point of fact, he "Finds that it is the practice of trade to send the storekeepers' warrants in implement of such a contract as that between the pursuer and defenders, from Glasgow to London through the medium of a bank, and that it is the duty of the party to whom they are sent, when he has received notice of their arrival, to call at said bank and take delivery of the warrants: Finds also that it is the practice of trade to send such warrants from Glasgow by the post which leaves that on the evening of the day before that on which they are deliverable in London: Finds, in point of law, that the storekeepers' warrants in question, accompanied by drafts for the price of the iron, having arrived in London during business hours of the day on which they were deliverable there, and the defenders having been advised of this by the pursuer's letter to them, which they received during business hours of that day, the defenders might have gone to the bank and received the warrants on that day: Finds, therefore, that the defenders have broken their contract with the pursuer, and are liable in damages accordingly: Therefore decerns against the defenders for the sum of L.421, 15s. 11d., with the legal interest thereof, in terms of the conclusions of the libel: Finds the pursuer entitled to expenses," &c.

On 27th February 1855, the Sheriff-depute (Alison) adhered. In a note he observed, that the "warrants having been presented by the Union Bank, London, at 10. 30 A.M., on the 24th November, the Sheriff holds that with the notice received by the defenders on the 23d, the presentation was duly made."

Both parties presented notes of advocacy, which were conjoined.

The defenders pleaded;—That the sale was conditional on the warrants

No. 196.

June 26, 1857.
Colvin v.

Short.

being presented on the 23d November. That the seller's intention that they should be so presented, while it proved the condition, was insufficient to relieve him of the consequences of their not being so presented. He should have despatched his communication by an earlier mail. The alleged usage was not established by the proof, and was irrelevant. If there was usage at all, it was local, and was not proved to have been known to the advocates, so as to affect the legal rights of parties. It was farther excluded, by the intimation that the warrants would be presented through one of two banks. But this letter not specifying at which of the two banks the warrants would be found, could not alter the legal position of parties. The advocates were not bound to have inquired as to this. On the assumption of the letters having been delivered on the 23d November, within business hours, the Union Bank failed to intimate to the advocates the arrival of the warrants, and to tender these for the price stipulated to be paid; and the advocates, even if otherwise liable in implement of the transaction, could not be bound, the notification and tender not having been made until a day too late.

The respondent (pursuer) pleaded;—That the defenders' objection was purely technical. It was not said that there was any change of circumstances between the 23d and 24th. The purchasers must make out that presentment at a certain counting-house in London on a certain day was a condition precedent to the bargain taking effect. If that was not an absolute condition precedent, then they were not entitled to object to the tender being on the 24th, especially as the seller was doing all that was in his power to give delivery.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The contract, out of which this litigation has arisen, was entered into in Glasgow. The price of the iron was to be paid in London, in exchange for storekeepers' warrants. There is no specification in any of the documents constituting the transaction of any particular place in London where that exchange was to take place. It appears from the evidence that the purchasers had a place of business in London, and that the seller had not.

Looking to the documents presented to us, the result which one would naturally have expected to follow from the terms of the contract would be, first, that upon the 23d November the drafts upon the purchasers would have been presented to them, and the cash paid in exchange for the storekeepers' warrants. If that had been done, no question could have arisen between the parties. If either party has failed to do what was incumbent on him, then arises the question, whether his contract can be founded on as an operative contract after the 23d of November.

On the one hand, the pursuer contends that he fulfilled his part of the contract, in respect that upon the 22d November, by the afternoon mail of that day, he despatched from Glasgow a letter addressed to the defenders, informing them that he had passed orders on them, per the Western Bank, which would be presented through the Union Bank, or Jones, Loyd, and Company, most probably the former; and in respect that of same date he sent these orders and warrants to the Union Bank of London, through the Western Bank of Scotland, where they arrived upon the 23d November, and that these letters were delivered in London about twenty minutes past three o'clock of the 23d November. The pursuer maintains that the essential condition of the contract was thus implemented, for he says that his letter to the defenders having been received by them, and the drafts and warrants duly transmitted to the Union Bank, it was the duty of the defenders to have gone to the bank and paid the money, and got up the warrants, which having failed to do, they cannot now get quit of this contract.

On the other hand, the defenders maintain that the contract contained the essential condition that the warrants should be given in exchange for the money upon the 23d November in London: That that did not take place, and that the failure was not attributable to them: That, in the first place, in order to effect that exchange, it was necessary that the warrants should be in London, and that the sending of them was the duty of the pursuer. The contract specified no place where the exchange was to take place, and in the absence of any such specification, they, the defenders, supposed that there was no place they could go to, but

No. 196. that their duty was to remain in their own counting-house. That a letter was written to them, to the effect that through the Union Bank, or Jones, Loyd, and Company, most probably the former, the orders would be presented, and that if the orders had been presented to them on the 23d November, they were ready to honour them, but that no presentation was made till the morning of the 24th, nor any communication made to them by the Union Bank, as being the holders of the orders—that this letter, therefore, could only mean that the orders would be presented to the defenders, on whom they were drawn, at their own place of business, which admittedly was not done on the 23d. It may be that the orders did not arrive in time to enable the bank to present them. But if so, the reason was that they had not been sent off in time. There was no detention of the mail by stress of weather. There was a daily post from Glasgow to London. The failure, therefore, to exchange the money for the warrants, was not the fault of the defenders, but of the parties who failed to present the orders to the defenders.

June 26, 1857.
Colvin v.
Short.

Looking to the documents, and without reference to anything else, except the fact that no presentment was made of the orders on the 23d November, nor intimation made by the Union Bank that they were in possession of the warrants to be exchanged for the price, I come to the conclusion without difficulty that the pursuer has failed in his duty. He failed to carry through the transaction on the 23d November. He failed to perform that essential condition of the contract, without the performing of which the other party could not be bound to abide by the contract. It might be very essential to carry through the transaction on the 23d. If there was a variation in the market, it might be very important to have it completed on that day. But it is not necessary to enquire into that, for I think it was of the essence of the contract that it should be done.

But the pursuer takes another position. He founds upon usage of trade, which, he says, gives a different construction and effect to the whole of this proceeding. He maintains that it entitles him to have this conclusion—which otherwise, I think, would have been the legal conclusion from these documents and facts—set aside, and to have an opposite conclusion drawn, rested on the usage of trade to which he refers. Now this usage of trade consists of two things. In the first place, the pursuer says there is usage in Glasgow to send off such warrants by the evening mail received in London on the day on which the exchange is to be made, and, in the second place, that there is usage of trade in London, not to go with the warrants to the purchaser, but to let the purchaser go to the warrants.

Now it would require very clear, consistent, and continued usage of trade to establish that a condition which is so much of the essence of a contract as presentment of delivery warrants on a particular day means that presentment need not be made till the following day ;—that when the seller has it in his power to send the warrants by a post which would make their presentment certain on the 23d November, he is entitled to keep them back till a post which must make such presentment uncertain. But, moreover, I hold there is here no such usage proved. Upon that point I think that the pursuer's case has failed.

As to the other point, in regard to the purchaser going to the seller or his agent for the warrants, I think that the pursuer has failed in proving any such usage even more signally than he has failed in proving the other. There is no such usage at all applicable to circumstances like the present. But even if there were such an usage in the general case, in this case the pursuer writes that he has passed orders on the defenders per Western Bank—"Am uncertain whether they shall be presented through the Union Bank or Jones, Loyd, and Co.—most probably the former." Now that is very intelligible language of trade. It plainly implies that the orders are to be sent to the place of business of the purchaser, and presented to him there,—which takes this case out of what is said to be usage of trade. Accordingly, the bank protest these bills on the 24th November, not at the bank, but at the place of business of the purchasers. There is also mention in the pursuer's letter of two banks, which is another peculiarity in this case. We are not told whether there is usage of trade for the seller intimating that the warrants are in one or other of two banks, and thus imposing upon the purchaser the duty of finding out in which bank they really are. Upon that part of his case the pursuer has signally failed. I have come to the conclusion that he has failed to make out any part of his case, and, therefore, that the Sheriff's interlocutor should be recalled, and the defenders assoilzied.

No. 196.

LORD IVORY.—The case has presented itself to my mind entirely in the same point of view. The contract is express, and I cannot read it otherwise than as imposing an obligation on the pursuer to present these orders to the defenders on the 23d November. They were not so presented. It does not matter what the excuse was for non-presentment. Time, in a contract of this kind, where the value of the subject varies from day to day, is of the essence of the contract. The purchasers were not bound to go one step to the Union Bank, or anywhere else. And the usage which is averred is excluded, both by the pursuer's correspondence, and by the conduct of the bank in protesting at the defenders' place of business. There was in fact no presentment. As to usage in Glasgow, I put it aside. As to usage in London, the most pregnant evidence is that of the cashier of the bank, who in his own person felt obliged to go to the place of business of the defenders to protest the dishonoured bills. I quite agree with your Lordship on all points.

June 26, 1857.
Colvin v.
Short.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—Since the pursuer has resorted to the remedy of an action of damages for breach of contract, instead of an action to compel payment of the price, the action must be dealt rigidly with on the principles applicable to a claim for damages. In this contract of sale the time of payment was express. It was of the essence of the contract; and I think that the pursuer has entirely failed in his case.

LORD DEAS.—This case appears to me to turn on the question, whether it was the duty of the advocates to call at the Union Bank in London after the post-office delivery, which took place between twenty minutes and half-past three o'clock on the afternoon of 23d November 1853, in order to get delivery of the iron warrants which arrived at that time and to pay the price, or whether the warrants and drafts for the price, or at all events the drafts accompanied by notice that the warrants had arrived, should have been on that day presented at the advocates' place of business?

We have it in evidence that there are great fluctuations in the iron trade, rendering punctuality in these matters material; and, indeed, it is set forth in the respondent's application for warrant of sale, presented within a few days after the stipulated day of delivery, that the iron market was then in a very fluctuating state, with a downward tendency, and it was the consequent apprehension of great loss unless the iron were immediately sold which was made the foundation of that application. If, therefore, the respondent did not duly tender delivery on the day stipulated, I cannot hold that he is entitled to damages (which is what he now seeks) for breach of bargain. On the other hand, if he did duly tender delivery, his claim of damages, which he estimates by the difference of price, would, I think, fall to be sustained.

Now, the contract is not explicit as to the place of payment and delivery, farther than that both are to be in London, and simultaneous with each other. I think it clear enough that, wherever payment was to be made delivery was to be given, and vice versa. The advocates had a place of business in London, which may raise some presumption in favour of the view they contend for; but, at the same time, the presumption is weak, and might easily have been overcome, for the contract, while it specifies a locality, namely London, does not specify the advocates' place of business in London, which might easily have been done if the parties meant it. But the parties themselves are the best interpreters of their own contract, when the contract itself is not explicit; and I think the whole facts and circumstances, along with the documentary evidence, shew that both parties understood timeous presentation of the drafts and warrants, or at all events of the drafts with notice of the arrival of the warrants, was necessary to be made at the advocates' place of business. The respondent's letter of the 22d bore that the warrants were to "be presented through the Union Bank, or Jones, Loyd, and Company, most probably the former." I do not go upon the mention of two banks, for the advocates inquired of neither. Nor do I look on the expression, presented through the bank, as necessarily inconsistent with the supposition that the advocates were to call at the bank, and this, otherwise, appeared to have been their duty. But the drafts for the price, addressed to the advocates, desired them to pay to the Union Bank "against warrants herewith;" and the bank's letter transmitted the drafts "for favour of acceptance and return;" and the bank, acting upon what they must have understood to be the nature of their instructions, did not attempt to protest the drafts

No. 196.
 —
 June 26, 1857.
 Colvin v.
 Short.

and exonerate themselves by allowing the drafts and warrants to lie at their office, but presented both the drafts and warrants on the 24th, and again on the 25th, recording the tender of the warrants and the presentation of the drafts, in separate notarial instruments, as the foundation of the protest for non-acceptance and non-payment—keeping the respondent at the same time advised each day, through the medium of the bank in Glasgow, of the steps thus taken as the necessary preliminaries to protesting and returning the drafts; to all which accordingly the respondent stated no objection. On the contrary, while the advocates, in their letters and telegraphic message of the 23d and 24th, expressed their understanding that the warrants should have been presented with the drafts on the 23d, the respondent in his letter of the 24th, in place of repudiating this construction of the contract, rested his whole answer to the advocates' refusal of implement, on the ground that he had forwarded the documents in good time, under ordinary circumstances, "to be presented yesterday," and that he could not suppose any honourable house would avail themselves of the pretext of the mail having been late to repudiate the contract. This letter, when taken in connection with the conduct of parties, appears to me to amount to a distinct admission that the documents fell to have been presented at the advocates' place of business, and that the only excuse (of the weight of which it is for us to judge) for this not being done on the 23d was the mail being late. Now, if the documents had been actually presented on the 23d, I should have regarded it as of no consequence when they had been despatched. But I have no doubt at all that the respondent took the risk of the mail being late, and that the accident of its being so forms no valid reason for non-fulfilment of his contract. The Union Bank clerk examined, states that the usual hours of banking business in London, with the public, are from nine to four, and that even assuming the documents to have arrived at the bank about three, they were not in time, according to the usual course of business, to have been presented on that day for payment. Upon this point I see no counter evidence. But, be this as it may, the documents were not presented on the 23d; and any question whether they should have been so must lie between the respondent and the bank, and not between the respondent and the advocates.

As regards the parole proof of usage, I do not go into the details of it, but there really is nothing like satisfactory proof of usage of parties going to the bank, in place of the bank sending to the parties, even if this had been a case in which the parties themselves had not, by their conduct and writings, construed their own contract, which I think they have done; and it is upon this ground, mainly, I am disposed to rest my opinion, that the Sheriff-court interlocutors ought to be recalled, and the advocates assoilzied.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—(After the findings in fact above quoted)—“Find, in point of law, 1st, That it was of the essence of the said contract that the exchange of cash for store-keepers' warrants should take place on 23d November in London: 2d, That the presentment of the drafts or warrants on that day to the defenders, or at their place of business, with a view to the exchange of cash for the warrants, was necessary to the due fulfilment of the contract on the part of the pursuer; 3d, That no such presentment having been made until the 24th November, the defenders cannot be held liable to the pursuer in damages as for violation of the contract, or for any expense or loss which the pursuer may have incurred by return of the drafts or resale of the iron: Find it not established that there is any usage of trade applicable to the circumstances which have occurred adverse to the above deductions in point of law. Therefore assoilzie the advocates from the whole conclusions and prayer of the summons and petition in the inferior court, and decree Find the advocates entitled to the expenses of both processes in the inferior court, and also in both processes and in the conjoined process in this Court, and remit,” &c.

MACBHAIR & PARKER, W.S.—RANKEN, WALKER, & JOHNSTON, W.S.—Agents.

MRS ELIZABETH HONYMAN GILLESPIE AND HUSBAND, Pursuers.—

D. F. Inglis—Macfarlane.

JAMES RUSSEL AND SON, Defenders.—Penney—Young.

No. 197.

June 26, 1857.
Gillespie v.
Russel.

Process—Res judicata—Relevancy.—A proprietor of minerals brought a reduction of a lease, on the ground of fraudulent concealment and misrepresentation by the lessees, who, it was averred, “had reason to believe” that there was in the proprietor’s lands, unknown to him, a valuable gas coal, and by misrepresentation induced him, in ignorance, to grant a lease, on terms disproportioned to the value of the minerals contained in it. The Court assoilzied the lessees from the action “as laid.” (1), In a second action of reduction laid on the same grounds, but averring actual, instead of speculative knowledge of the existence of the mineral,—plea of res judicata repelled (aff. judgment of Lord Ardmillan, diss. Lord Deas). (2), Case sent to trial to have the facts ascertained without an interlocutor of relevancy being pronounced.

SEE ante, vol. xvii. p. 1; and vol. xviii. p. 677.

The pursuer, Mrs Gillespie, was heiress of entail in possession of the lands of Torbanehill. On 30th March 1850, she and her husband entered into a missive of agreement with the defenders, James Russel and Son, coal-masters, by which they let the whole coal, ironstone, iron ore, limestone, and fire-clay (but not to comprehend copper, or any other minerals whatsoever, except those therein specified), in the lands of Torbanehill, for the period of twenty-five years from and after Candlemas 1850. In 1854 Mr and Mrs Gillespie brought an action of reduction and damages against Messrs Russel and Son, containing conclusions to the effect that they were not entitled as tenants to work a certain gas coal in the lands of Torbanehill, and that they were liable to the pursuers in damages for doing so. Judgment was pronounced in favour of the defenders. The pursuers then raised an action of reduction of the lease on the ground of fraud. Judgment was pronounced assoilzieing the defenders from the conclusions of that action “as laid.” The grounds of action and of the judgment were fully reported ante, vol. xviii. p. 677. Mr and Mrs Gillespie now brought this action of reduction of the missive of agreement, on the narrative that it had been obtained “to their great hurt and prejudice;” and concluding to have the missive of agreement reduced, and declared “to have been from the beginning, to be now, and in all time coming, null and void, and of no avail, force, strength, or effect in judgment, or outwith the same in time coming, and the pursuers reponed and restored thereagainst in integrum, for the reasons and causes set forth in the condescendence and plea thereunto annexed;” and concluding also “for payment to the pursuers of one hundred and fifty thousand pounds sterling, or such other sum as our said Lords shall find to be the value of the said minerals so put out, worked, and sold by the defenders from the pursuers’ foresaid lands of Torbanehill, under colour of said lease or missive of agreement, to the date of citation of this process; or alternatively, “to hold just count, reckoning, and payment with the pursuers, in respect of the same, and to exhibit and produce before our said Lords a full and particular state of accounts in relation to the premises, whereby the sum or balance due by the defenders to the pursuers may appear and be established by our said Lords.”

The pursuers’ averments in their condescendence were as follows:—

1. The defenders have been for many years very extensive workers of coal and other minerals, particularly in the counties of Linlithgow and Stirling; and in, and prior to, January 1850, they were lessees of the coal and other minerals in the lands of Boghead, which adjoin the pursuers’ property Torbanehill, which is situated in the neighbourhood, and to the south, of

No. 197. Bathgate, and in the county of Linlithgow. 2. There does exist in the mineral estates of Torbanehill and Boghead a stratum of a substance of the nature of gas coal, of a richer quality, and more valuable, than any gas coal known to exist prior to January 1850. 3. In and prior to the said month of January 1850, the defenders had, by careful investigation, made themselves aware of the nature and stratification of the coal and other minerals in the district of country around Bathgate; and, in particular, they had made themselves thoroughly acquainted with the nature, quality, and extent of the minerals in the pursuers' lands of Torbanehill. They had, by inquiry, experiment, skilful analysis, and otherwise, satisfied themselves, and they knew and had become perfectly aware, that there existed in these lands of Torbanehill a gas coal, or other mineral substance of the nature of coal, of the richest and most valuable quality,—richer and more valuable than any coal previously wrought or known, as specified in article 2. 4. The defenders had then recently found, in the adjoining lands of Boghead, the stratum of this gas coal or mineral substance; and they knew, as already mentioned, that it was in the lands of Torbanehill. But the existence of the mineral in question in Torbanehill and Boghead, and its character and qualities, were unknown except to the defenders. 5. The defenders had also, in and prior to the said month of January 1850, ascertained, and they knew, that not only was the said coal or mineral substance in itself of a much richer quality and higher value than any known coal, but also, that it was to be found in the pursuers' lands in great abundance, and could be wrought and turned out to immense advantage and profit. 6. On the other hand, the pursuers were, in January 1850, and for some time after the missive of agreement or lease under reduction had been granted, as after-mentioned, entirely ignorant of the existence of the said gas coal or mineral substance. The pursuer, Mr Gillespie, was also, during the time the negotiation for obtaining the said lease was going on, and until after the same was executed, as after-mentioned, in a very bad state of health, unable to give much attention to business, and was resident at some distance from Torbanehill, in a different county from that in which these lands are situated. 7. In or about the beginning of January 1850, the defenders proposed to the pursuers to take a lease of the minerals in Torbanehill. The object of the defenders in doing so was to obtain a right to the valuable gas coal or mineral substance which had been ascertained by them to be in the lands of Torbanehill, as above mentioned; but they did not disclose this to the pursuers. On the contrary, from the beginning, and throughout their negotiation with the pursuers, they not only designedly concealed what they had really in view, in order the better to accomplish their object, but also disguised their object by false and fraudulent representations; and thereby induced the pursuers, in ignorance of the nature and value of the subject with which they were dealing, to enter into the lease under reduction. 8. The defenders, in opening the negotiation with the pursuers for the lease in question, pretended and represented that their object was to work various minerals—specifying, in particular, the ironstone and iron ore in Torbanehill. They pretended, and falsely represented, that the coal in the lands was of little importance, and this they did for the purpose of fraudulently misleading and deceiving the pursuers as to the true nature and quality of the minerals in the lands of Torbanehill. 9. The defenders did further, in the course of their communications with the pursuers, in the months of January, February, and March 1850, falsely and fraudulently state and represent that no such gas coal as that above described, nor any similar mineral substance of value, existed in the lands of Torbanehill, while all the time they had satisfactorily ascertained, and perfectly well knew, that the foresaid most valuable gas coal or mineral substance existed in great quantities in said lands, and was capable of being worked and turned out to immense advantage and profit. These false and fraudulent statements and representations were made for the purpose of deceiving and misleading the pursuers, and inducing them to grant the lease under reduction. 10. The pursuers were deceived and misled by the said false and fraudulent statements and representations made to them by the defenders; and, relying on these, the pursuers granted the missive of agreement or lease under challenge. They were induced to execute the said lease solely in consequence of the fraudulent concealment by the defenders of the existence and nature of the mineral above mentioned, and of the false and fraudulent statements and representations above set forth; which, at the time, they believed to be honestly and truly made by the defenders, who were persons of good and well known skill in such matters. Had it not been for the fraudulent concealment, and the false and fraudulent statements and representations of the defenders, the pursuers would not have entered into the missive of agreement or contract of lease in question.”

June 26, 1857.
Gillespie v.
Russel.

No. 197.
June 26, 1857.
Gillespie v.
Russel.

The pursuers then narrated the missive of agreement between them and the defenders, and stated, “art. 12. By this contract of lease, and particularly by the stipulation regarding the lordship on coal, the pursuers have been grossly defrauded, and have suffered great loss and damage—the lordship stipulated being an entirely inadequate equivalent or return for the abovementioned valuable gas coal or mineral substance which is found in the lands. It did not amount to one-fourth of the lordship or equivalent to which the pursuers were fairly and justly entitled, and which they would have readily obtained for the said gas coal or mineral substance. 13. The defenders, soon after the date of the said missive of agreement or lease, entered into possession of the mineral field thereby let, and they thereafter began to work the gas coal or valuable substance abovementioned. Though they also found in the lands of Torbanehill valuable ironstone, iron ore, and fireclay, as well as other minerals mentioned in the lease, it soon became apparent that all these had, as before stated, been referred to merely as a blind to conceal from the pursuers the true object the defenders had in view; and accordingly they confined their operations exclusively, or all but exclusively, to the working, putting out, and selling of the said gas-coal or valuable mineral substance, which they disposed of, and have since continued to sell, at very high prices, and in large quantities, to the damage and enormous lesion of the pursuers. The defenders found the said gas-coal or mineral substance in Torbanehill from the very first. They have found and worked it in every pit which they have yet opened in the lands of Torbanehill.”

The pursuers concluded, by stating the extent to which the defenders had worked the gas coal, and its increased value or price in the market, which they said was owing to “its peculiar properties—those intrinsic properties, in virtue of which it is as to the categories of quantity and quality of certain products a mineral sui generis.”

They pleaded;—“1. The pursuers having been induced to enter into the contract in question by the fraudulent concealment, and false and fraudulent representations of the defenders, as condescended on, the pursuers are entitled to decree as concluded for. 2. The former action, and the judgment of the Court therein, cannot support the defenders’ plea of res judicata, in respect that the allegations of the pursuers, and the media includendi, were essentially different in the former action from what they are in the present.”

The defenders referred to the previous actions, and pleaded;—“1. Res judicata, in respect of the judgments in the previous action of reduction, &c. at the instance of the pursuers against the defenders. 2. The pursuers’ statements in the summons and in the record are irrelevant, and insufficient to support the conclusions of the action. 3. In particular, the summons and record contain no relevant allegation of facts to shew fraud on the part

No. 197.
 June 26, 1857.
 Gillespie v.
 Russell.

of the defenders, and to support the reductive conclusions upon that ground. 4. The action is irrelevant, and cannot be maintained, in respect, 1st, There was no duty of disclosure on the part of the defenders in regard to any of the matters which they are alleged to have concealed from the pursuers; and, 2d, The defenders had no peculiar knowledge, or peculiar means of knowledge, in regard to any of the matters which they are alleged either to have misrepresented to the pursuers, or concealed from them, and it is not relevantly alleged that they had. 5. The pursuers having had the means of ascertaining for themselves the value and capabilities of the mineral field in their estate, cannot reduce the lease thereof to the defenders upon any of the grounds set forth in their condescendence and pleas. 6. The pursuers are barred by their own conduct and proceedings from challenging the lease upon any ground whatever. 7. The action being altogether unfounded in fact, cannot be maintained."

The Lord Ordinary, on 3d July 1856, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary having heard counsel for the parties on the plea of res judicata, being the first preliminary plea urged by the defenders, and having made avizandum, and considered the debate, productions, and whole process—Repels the said plea; and, in respect that the defenders have given notice of their intention to bring this judgment under review, finds the said defenders liable in expenses; allows an account thereof to be given in," &c. *

* "NOTE.—If this action is substantially and materially different from the preceding, the plea of res judicata cannot be sustained, for the rule of competent and omitted does not apply to a pursuer.—(Stair, 4, 40, 16; Ersk., 4, 3, 3; Kames' Eluc., art. 28; Paton, 22d June, 1681, M. 12,228; Kinloch, 27th December 1692, M. 12,233; Strachan, 6th December 1727, M. 12,239.) The application of the rule, in some cases, to suspenders, is a confirmation of the previous authorities, as in regard to this plea, suspenders are held to be in the position of defenders—(Napier v. Carson, 7th February 1828, 6 S. and D. 500; Barbour, 27th May 1828, 6 S. and D. 860); and in the more recent cases of Lord Strathmore, 24th May 1833 (11 S. and D. 644), and Lord Macdonald, 26th May 1840 (2 D. 889), it is quite settled that the plea of competent and omitted does not apply to the pursuer of a reduction on different media concludendi. Nor is the decision in the case of Campbell v. Stewart, 20th February 1838 (16 S. and D. 632), adverse to this principle, for in that case there had been a verdict on the facts by a jury, and a decree of absolvitor following on the verdict; and the Court were of opinion that there was no new medium concludendi, and that the pursuer, having only improved his record, was truly seeking 'to have the same cause retried.' Of course the retrying of the same cause, under colour of bringing a new action, cannot be permitted; and the important question is—whether this action is 'the same' as that already decided or not?

"Mere variation of words or elaboration of statement, will not, on the one hand, be sufficient to constitute a difference; and, on the other hand, the fact, that the parties, the subject, the conclusions, of the actions are the same, will not be sufficient to constitute identity. The substantive averments in the two actions must be compared, in order to ascertain whether there is substantial identity with colourable variation, or whether there are such new averments as to amount to new media concludendi.

"After careful comparison of the averments of the pursuers, in the former and in the present action, especially with reference to the opinions of the Court in the previous decision, the Lord Ordinary has arrived at the conclusion, that the actions are really distinguishable in substantial and important particulars, and that the plea of res judicata ought to be repelled.

"It is not necessary to allude to the first action raised by the pursuers, the object of which was to withdraw from the lease to the defenders the mineral in question, on the ground that it was not a coal, and was not within the scope of the lease. The result of that action was to settle conclusively, that the mineral, whatever may

Against this interlocutor the defenders reclaimed, and, on 26th November No. 196.
1856, the Court pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall, in hoc

June 26, 1857.

Gillespie v.
Russel.

its mineralogical or geological character, was within the meaning of the description in the lease, and was actually let to the defenders.

"The second action, which is the one now founded on by the defenders, was brought to reduce the lease on the ground of fraud. The Court found that 'the pursuers have not averred facts relevant and sufficient to support the conclusions of libel,' and therefore assoilzied the defenders 'from the action as laid.' These facts were advisedly introduced, in order that the pursuers, if they should bring a new action otherwise laid, might not be excluded by the plea of res judicata. The action from which the defenders were thus assoilzied, was disposed of, in respect of sufficient averment of facts to support the charge of fraud; but the fraud was not investigated, and the validity of the lease was not judicially sustained. The plea urged by the defenders, appears to the Lord Ordinary to be different from that urged to exclude a second action, brought after an absolvitor on a verdict or facts ascertained by proof on commission. In the case of absolvitor on a verdict on a proof, the ground of action is inquired into, and is negatived. In the case under consideration, the ground of action was not negatived, for inquiry was stopped in consequence of the insufficiency of the allegations. All that was decided, was that the pursuers' averments in 'the action as laid,' were not such as to entitle them to try their conclusions of reduction.

When the allegations and conclusions of this summons are compared with those of the preceding, especially with reference to the particular points mentioned in the opinion of the Lord President, the difference is at once perceived. Whether the averments now made are, or are not, relevant and sufficient, it is premature at present to inquire. It is enough that they are different. This is not merely a summons in an amended form, with more specific averment of matters, of which there was general averment in the former action,—it is a summons with distinct averments not previously made, and the lack of which was noticed in the last action.

Besides a difference in the conclusions, which are no longer qualified in the manner noticed by the Lord President, and several minor differences in the statements, which are generally more definite and precise, there is, in the first place, an important new averment of actual knowledge by the defenders that this valuable gas was in the pursuers' lands of Torbanehill in abundance, and could be wrought to profit, and of entire ignorance of the existence of the mineral on the part of the pursuers. (Arts. 3, 4, 5, and 6, of the condescendence.) In the former action, as to the probable existence of this mineral in Torbanehill, reached inferentially from knowledge of its existence in Boghead, was alleged; and the failure to disprove this belief was held not sufficient to support the charge of fraud. In the present action, the pursuers aver knowledge by ascertainment of the actual fact. The averment (Art. 3) is quite explicit, and the means by which the knowledge is said to have been obtained by the defenders, are specified as 'Enquiry, experiment, analysis, and otherwise.' The effect of the defenders' actual knowledge of the existence, the quality, and the capability of profitable working of this mineral in Torbanehill, and of their obtaining from the pursuers a lease by concealing their knowledge of the fact, was not judicially disposed of in the last action. It could not be, for it was not relevantly and sufficiently alleged. It is, however, now alleged in this action, and in that respect the action is distinct from the preceding. In the second place, there is, in the present summons (Art. 9 of Condescendence), an averment of direct statements and misrepresentations of a false and fraudulent character made by the defenders to the pursuers, in regard to this mineral, in order to obtain the lease, and made by the defenders in the knowledge that the statements were contrary to the fact. The articles 3d and 9th of the condescendence taken together, bring out this new medium concludendi.

The defenders maintain that these averments are not new, but that they were substantially made in the former action; and they refer particularly to articles 4, 5, and 21 of the former condescendence.* But in that former action the defenders took a different view of the record, and they succeeded in satisfying the Court that as embodied in previous report. See also opinion of Lord Deas in former action.

No. 197. statu, the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary reclaimed against; and remit to his Lordship to ordain the production to be satisfied, reserving the preliminary defences to be discussed along with the merits; and to appoint a record to be made up and closed, and to proceed with the cause.”

June 26, 1857. Gillespie v. Russel.

A record was then made up and closed, and on 26th February 1857, the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—“Repels the plea of res judicata stated for the defenders: Finds that the pursuers have alleged facts relevant to go to issue; and appoints the pursuers to lodge such issues as they propose within ten days from this date.” *

it was ‘not relevant and sufficient to support the conclusions.’ The defenders then read the averments in the former record, so as to confine them within the narrowest limits of the strictest construction. They now seek to read the same averments so as to extend them to the widest range of liberal construction. The Lord Ordinary has endeavoured to ascertain the true meaning of the pursuers’ averments in both actions. On a reasonable construction of the words used, he thinks that there are averments in the present summons which are not within those in the former action, but are new; and particularly, that the averments in the 3d and 9th articles, taken together, are new, and, therefore, he is of opinion that this action is ‘otherwise laid,’ and is consequently not excluded by the absolvitor from the former action ‘as laid.’

“On these grounds, and without at present indicating any opinion on the relevancy and sufficiency of the averments in this action, the plea of res judicata has been repelled.”

* “NOTE.—This action, brought by the pursuers Mr and Mrs Gillespie, for reduction of the lease of the minerals of Torbanehill, on the head of fraudulent concealment and misrepresentation, has been resisted on two grounds, urged by the defenders as sufficient to dispose of it without inquiry into the facts. In the first place, the defenders plead res judicata, in respect of the judgment of the Court in the previous action. In the second place, they plead that the averments in the present action are not relevant to support its conclusions.

“In considering the plea of res judicata, it is necessary to attend to the circumstances in which it is stated.

“The former action was disposed of by a judgment on the relevancy, and the defenders were ‘assolized from the action as laid,’—the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary having been slightly varied by the Court, in order so to express the absolvitor. There was, of course, no investigation into the facts; and there was no decision on the relevancy of any averments except those made on that record. The argument of the defenders in the previous action was, that knowledge on their part, of the existence of this coal in Torbanehill as of an ascertained fact, apart from mere speculation or inference from its presence in Boghead, was not then alleged, and the decision of the Court rested mainly on this defect—this absence of averment of the defenders’ actual knowledge. But now, the argument of the defenders is, that their actual knowledge of the existence of this coal in Torbanehill, was really averred in the former action; and therefore, that it is not matter of averment in the present action. The former case was decided on the first view of the averments which was then successfully maintained by the defenders. As knowledge as of an ascertained fact was held by the Court, on considering the record, not to be averred, and on that ground, taken in necessary connection with the manner in which misrepresentation was alleged, the defenders were assolized from ‘the action as laid.’ Can the defenders now succeed in throwing out the present action on the ground (in direct opposition to their previous pleading), that knowledge on their part was really averred in the former action? The Lord Ordinary, though much impressed by the legal difficulties so ably urged by the defenders, is yet of opinion that this ought not to be permitted.

“After a renewed and careful comparison of the averments in the two actions, the Lord Ordinary is still of opinion that there are such differences as to distinguish the present from the former action, to make it, in important respects, a new action, and so to save it from being excluded by the plea of res judicata, founded on the judgment of absolvitor from the former action ‘as laid.’ If this action is laid on grounds

No. 197.

June 26, 1857.

Gillespie v.
Russel.

Against this interlocutor the defenders reclaimed, and pleaded;—That his and the former action were identical, in respect, (1), both related to fairly and substantially different from those stated on the former record, then it is not so laid as to be within the absolutor from the former action 'as laid.' This was the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, when, on 3d July 1856, he repelled the plea of res judicata, as then urged. The record has since been closed on the revised papers, the statements of fact and pleas in law have been completed and adjusted, and the plea of res judicata is now urged to exclude this action. The Lord Ordinary having had the benefit of most ingenious and elaborate argument, in which the whole subject of res judicata has been amply discussed, has not seen reason to change the opinions he formerly expressed, and to which he now refers.

"Two points have been especially pressed on his attention. The first is—that the condescendence annexed to the summons in the former action, the pursuers averred that the defenders 'were well aware' that the mineral substance found in Boghead was to be found in large quantity in the lands of Torbanehill; and that in addition, made on revisal, to the words 'were well aware,' viz., 'or had sufficient grounds for believing,' did not so derogate from the previous averment as to prevent its being a proper averment of knowledge made in 'the action as laid,' from which the defenders were assoilzied. This difference of expression between the summons and the revised condescendence does not appear to have been brought under the notice of the Court in the former action; and, as already explained, the case was decided on an analysis of the record, and on the footing of knowledge being alleged. But even taking the words as they stand in the summons, and reading them in connection with the other statements there made, the question still remains, Do they amount to an averment of knowledge of the existence of this coal in Torbanehill as a fact ascertained, and not merely as the result of speculation and inference from the workings at Boghead? The Lord Ordinary thinks that, even reading the summons by itself, there was no averment of such actual knowledge. It amounted only to this, that the defenders having worked and sold the Boghead coal, were, from the results of that working, aware, as matter of inference or deduction, that the same mineral was likely to be found in Torbanehill. But the summons cannot be separated from the record: the whole record should be considered; and it was carefully considered by the Court, and the result of that consideration was, that, not from the conclusions of the summons generally, but 'from the action as laid,' the defenders were assoilzied.

The second point was—that the additional averments made in this action might have been made in the former action under the summons, and therefore that they were not new, to the effect of being now competent.

It is said that a new ground of action could not have been added;—these averments could have been added;—therefore, these averments do not amount to a new ground of action. This argument is very plausible, and, when viewed with reference to the opinion of Lord Corehouse in Campbell v. Stewart, 20th Feb. 1838, has been felt by the Lord Ordinary to be forcible; and it is not without hesitation and difficulty that he has refused effect to it. The case of Campbell v. Stewart was a case of a new action after a verdict for the defender had been returned, and had been applied by the Court. The defender had, after verdict, been assoilzied from the conclusions of the libel, under reservation only of the effect of a judicial minute, which did not include the point sought to be raised in the supplementary action. The pursuer's case had been put in issue, and decided on evidence. The only points which the pursuer desired to keep open were reserved in the minute, and the Court would not allow a different point, which had not been reserved, to be brought forward in a new action. That is a very different case from the present, where the truth of the pursuers' allegations has never been investigated, and where the averments now made have never been judicially considered.

To say that the new averments might have been made in the former action, and must therefore be now excluded, is just to urge the plea of 'competent and settled' against the pursuers. Take the case of Lord Strathmore, 24th May 1833. The arguments now urged would have applied to that case;—the new matter might have been there stated in the first action. The plea of vitiation, as a reason of rejection, was, according to common style, stated in the first action by Lord Strath-

No. 197. the same transaction; (2), In both the defenders were charged with fraudulent concealment and misrepresentation with reference to that transaction.
 June 26, 1857.
 Gillespie v.
 Russel.

more. It would, of course, have been competent to allege on record, as matter of fact, that the deed was actually vitiated in substantialibus. But, notwithstanding this, the Court sustained a new action, laid on the averment of actual vitiation, and adhered to Lord Moncreiff's interlocutor, repelling the plea of res judicata, on the ground, as stated by him, that 'there cannot be res judicata on any particular question or ground of action where that question or ground has never been truly or in plain reality raised and brought into discussion between the parties.' So also in the case of Lord Macdonald, 26th May 1840, a new action was sustained and the plea of res judicata was repelled, the exception of 'competent and omitted' being found not applicable to a pursuer under such circumstances. Although, therefore, the argument of the defenders has a syllogistic aspect, and although it derives some force from the rules of pleading recognised in our procedure under the Judicature Act, still it is only another and a very ingenious mode of applying the plea of competent and omitted, to a case where it is not appropriate.

"The case which the pursuers of this action now state, both as regards the alleged knowledge of the defenders, the mode by which they attained that knowledge, and the nature of their alleged misrepresentations made in that knowledge, is one on which hitherto there has been no judicial deliverance. If such a case were excluded without inquiry, on the plea of res judicata, the forms of law would operate to the exclusion of justice.

"Looking to the averments on this record, and especially to the 3d, 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th, and 9th articles in the revised condescendence, which must be considered together, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the pursuers have now made averments relevant to go to issue.

"They now allege—1st, That the defenders, when they entered into the lease, had ascertained, and knew as a fact, that this valuable gas coal was in the lands of Torbanehill in abundance, and was capable of being wrought to great advantage; 2d, That the pursuers were ignorant of that fact; 3d, That the defenders, being in the knowledge of that important fact by actual ascertainment thereof, not only concealed their knowledge, and disguised their object during the negotiations, but 'did falsely and fraudulently state and represent that no such gas coal existed in Torbanehill;' and, 4th, That by such false and fraudulent representations made knowingly contrary to the fact, they induced the pursuers to grant the lease.

"This is not now stated as a case of speculative conjecture or expectation, nor as a case of mere concealment of opinion, or even concealment of a certain kind of knowledge derived from experiments on Boghead coal. It is stated as a case of fraud—a case of wilful false statement, and misrepresentation of fact, made in order to deceive, and with the effect of deceiving, the pursuers.

"There may be great difficulty in establishing such a case by evidence, and there are many presumptions against it; but the Lord Ordinary is unable to see how the case, as now put, can be disposed of at once and without inquiry. It rests on averments of intentional deceit, of wilful falsehood, of fraus dans causam contractui. These are very strong statements. Their truth must be assumed, in the question of relevancy, for the pursuers undertake to prove them, and if they are true, then there is no authority for supporting against challenge by reduction, a contract obtained by such fraud, to the great prejudice of the party deceived. The Lord Ordinary found the former action not relevant, but he feels compelled to take a different view of the action now before him, which is different in essential particulars; and he has been unable to discover in the opinions of the Judges of the First Division on the former case, anything opposed to the view now taken under altered circumstances.

"Where both parties are on an equality as to knowledge, mere superiority of skill or judgment is of no consequence. Where parties are not on an equality, but one party has acquired actual knowledge of an important fact not known to the other, and does not state that fact, they may still transact for a sale, or for a lease, because there is no duty of disclosure. But where one party has obtained knowledge of an important fact of which the other party is ignorant, and, in regard to that matter, wilfully misrepresents the fact, in order to deceive, and with the effect

No. 197.

June 26, 1857.

Gillespie v.
Russel.

3), In both the subject of the alleged fraudulent concealment and misrepresentation was the existence of the gas coal in question in Torbanehill, and the quality of it; (4), In both the pursuers averred their own ignorance of the existence of this mineral, and of the quality of it; (5), In both it was alleged that the defenders' real object in negotiating for a lease and obtaining it, was to get possession of this coal, while they pretended as a blind that they desired a variety of other minerals included in the lease. The present action was said to differ from the former, in respect, (1), in the first action the defenders' actual knowledge, as distinguished from speculative opinion, or "having good reason to believe" in the existence of this mineral Torbanehill, and the quality of it, was not averred, while in this present action such actual knowledge was averred; (2), That in the present action there was a more satisfactory statement by the pursuers of the cause of the defenders' knowledge than in the first; and (3), That in the first action the fraudulent concealment and misrepresentation by the defenders of the facts known to them, were not distinctly averred, while in this present action they were distinctly averred. But comparing the two summonses, the averment of knowledge in the first action was as explicit as in the present action. In the former it was, "you were well aware," or "had sufficient ground for believing" that such a mineral existed. In this action it is, "you knew it existed," "you were perfectly aware." There was therefore no difference in the two actions in this respect. The words in the former action, which prejudiced the case of the pursuers, were here omitted. In other respects, the summonses were identical.

2. As to the cause of knowledge: article 3 of the present action, which did not contain anything upon the subject, said that this knowledge was gained "by inquiry, experiment, skilful analysis, and otherwise." "Inquiry" is impossible, because the pursuers averred that the existence of the coal was only known to the defenders; therefore, that being left out of view, there remained only "experiment" and "skilful analysis." No particulars were given. The previous action stated what the experiment and skilful analysis was. It could not be said, therefore, that the statement in this action was more satisfactory than in the other. If it was meant to aver that other mineral than what was set forth in the lease was the subject of experiment, that ought to have been stated. There was nothing in the alleged condescendence in this case which could not have been introduced under the original summons. That was a good test whether this was an action on new grounds or not.

Again, by the Judicature Act, the pursuer was bound to set forth all the facts of the case. Therefore the previous judgment must be presumed to have proceeded on a statement of all the facts of the case, and being adverse to the pursuer, that implied that there were no facts to support his case, that he had not got evidence sufficient to do so. The question came to be, whether there anything material or immaterial in this record which might not have been dealt with under the original record? In the view of the Lord Ordinary, if the Court decide against the relevancy of this case, the pursuers could bring another, and perhaps still another action more skilfully framed, receiving, so that the contract is induced by the false representation, such a contract cannot stand. Ex dolo non oritur contractus. On the effect of direct deception (as distinct from the mere use of the advantage of superior knowledge) under such circumstances, reference has been made to Sugden on the Law of Vendors and Purchasers, p. 5; and to the case of Turner v. Harvey, 1 Jac. Rep. 169. That is a case where one party to a transaction of sale had obtained knowledge of a material fact of which the other party was ignorant. The remarks of Lord Eldon on the effect of even the slightest attempt to mislead or deceive by false statement, or such circumstances, are very important."

No. 197. in endless repetition, and so reduce the question to one of expenses. When an action related to the same subject, had the same conclusions, and the same medium concludendi as a previous action, the plea of res judicata applied.

June 26, 1857.
Gillespie v.
Russel.

The pursuers pleaded ;—That the ground of action alleged in this case was not speculative knowledge or belief on the part of the defenders, but positive knowledge that this mineral was in the lands of Torbanehill.¹

This action was to be considered by itself and not by comparison with the previous action. It was sufficiently alleged (art. 3 and 4) that before and during the negotiations as to the lease, the defenders knew that there were seams of this mineral in Torbanehill.

Taking these statements in connection with articles 9 and 10, the question was, how far did such allegation, as between seller and purchaser, or lessor and lessee, operate to void the contract? If knowledge, as matter of fact, was averred, the means of acquiring that knowledge was of no consequence in a question of relevancy, for the knowledge may be proved, and yet it may be impossible to prove how that knowledge was acquired. The averments on that subject essentially distinguished this case from the previous one, and the previous judgment therefore could not be pleaded as res judicata in this action.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case we had an argument on the question of res judicata before the record was closed. We thought it desirable to close the record before disposing of that plea. We have now heard an argument on the whole matter, which leads us to inquire what was the judgment in the previous action betwixt the pursuers and the defenders. That judgment, as pronounced by the Lord Ordinary originally stood thus :—“Repels the first plea in law stated for the defenders, but finds the pursuers have not averred facts relevant and sufficient to support the conclusions of the libel, and, therefore, sustains the 2d and 3d pleas for the defenders, and assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the action,” &c. The first plea in law for the defenders which was thus repelled, was a plea of res judicata in respect of the verdict and judgment in the previous action of declarator. It was out of the question to give effect to that plea. That interlocutor, it will be observed, after disposing of the plea of res judicata, finds that the pursuers had not averred facts relevant and sufficient to support the conclusions of the libel, and sustains the 2d and 3d pleas for the defenders. The 2d and 3d pleas for the defenders so sustained are thus stated in the record in that action :—“(2.) The statements in the condescendence are irrelevant, and insufficient to support the conclusions of the action, and, generally, the action is irrelevantly and insufficiently laid. (3.) In particular, the condescendence contains no relevant allegation of facts to shew fraud on the part of the defenders, and to support the reductive conclusions upon this ground.” The Lord Ordinary did not dispose of the 4th plea, which was a plea of some importance in the case, and which also involved the question of relevancy. It was as follows :—“4. The action is irrelevant, and cannot be maintained, in respect 1st, there was no duty of disclosure on the part of the defenders in regard to any of the matters which they are alleged to have concealed from the pursuers; and 2d, the defenders had no peculiar knowledge, or peculiar means of knowledge, in regard to any of the matters which they are alleged to have either misrepresented to the pursuers, or concealed from them, and it is not relevantly alleged that they had.”

The Court, in dealing with that interlocutor, made a variation upon it and pronounced this interlocutor :—“The Lords, having considered the reclaiming note for the parties, and heard counsel, refuse the desire of the notes, and adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary reclaimed against, with this variation, that instead of assoilzieing the defenders from the conclusion of the action, the Lords assoilzie the defenders from the action as laid.” Now in introducing these words, “from the action as laid,” I do not understand that it was the intention of the Court to decide anything in regard to the plea of res judicata, either that it should be

¹ St Leonard's Vendors, &c., p. 5 (Ed. 1846).

No. 197.

June 26, 1857.
Gillespie v.
Russel.

excluded, or that it should be kept open, but to leave that question for discussion in any future action. Such was the judgment pronounced. Now, what was the action from which the Court so assoilzied the defenders? The action was for reduction of this lease of the minerals in the lands of Torbanehill. It was an action for reduction of the lease of these minerals, on the ground of fraud—and specially with reference to the mineral that has been the subject of so much discussion. The action was based on the ground of substantial error, as apart from fraud. In the condescendence, it is said:—“In entering into said lease or missive of agreement for a lease, the pursuers laboured under error in substantialibus; they were in entire ignorance of the nature and value of the mineral in question; and in place of being aware of its true nature and value, they were led by the defenders to believe that the only coal or substance in the lands of the nature of coal, or suitable for any one of the purposes for which coal was applied, was of inferior quality and value. Had they known or been aware of the true state of matters, they would not have consented to the terms of the foresaid missive of lease, nor entered into the same.”

The conclusions of that former action were also peculiar. The judgment went very much on the ground of that peculiarity. The conclusions of that action deserve notice again. They were to this effect:—That for the reasons and causes set forth in the condescendence, the defenders should be ordained to exhibit the missive of lease to be seen and considered by our said Lords, and to hear and see the same, with all that has followed or may follow thereupon, in so far at least as it is or can be held to include a valuable mineral substance of an argillaceous or other nature, which the said defenders have been working, outputting, and selling under the name of gas, or parrot, or cannel coal, or Boghead, or Bathgate gas coal, reduced, &c.; and the pursuers reponed and restored thereagainst in integrum, at least to the extent and effect foresaid.”

I have already stated that in that action fraud was alleged with reference to the defenders' knowledge of the existence of the mineral in Torbanehill, and one ground of reduction was applicable to such fraud. There was another and more general ground of reduction in respect of essential error. The pleas in law, as stated in the closed record in that action, were as follows:—“1. The object and media conduendi of the present action being entirely different from those of the previous action of declarator between the same parties, that previous action forms no bar to the present action. 2. So far as the said missive of agreement can be held to include the valuable mineral substance which is worked and sold by the defenders under the name of gas, parrot, or cannel coal, or Boghead or Bathgate gas, parrot, or cannel coal, the said lease, or missive of agreement for a lease, ought to be reduced and set aside on the ground of fraudulent misrepresentation by the defenders of material facts and circumstances as condescended on. 3. So far as the said missive can be held to include the said valuable mineral substance, it is reducible, in respect the pursuers were induced to enter into the lease, so far as the said mineral is concerned, by the fraudulent concealment by the defenders of essential facts, which, in the circumstances, they were bound not to conceal from the pursuers. 4. The lease or missive of agreement is, in the circumstances, reducible, on the ground of error in substantialibus on the part of the pursuers.”

The action, therefore, so far as laid on the ground of fraud, concluded for reduction of the lease only in so far as it related to that mineral substance. The conclusions for total reduction of the lease were laid upon substantial error. The action was therefore altogether of a peculiar character. But the main point here is to consider whether the question raised in this action is or is not substantially and legally to be regarded as the same question that we dealt with in the former action, as in an action laid generally upon fraud. Fraud is a very general word. It does not follow that because two actions are laid on fraud they are the same; nor that, being so laid, for the purpose of arriving at the same result, they are the same. The general character of the fraud, and especially the grounds of fraud, must both be looked at; and for that purpose we must look to the summons, and also to the condescendence. Now the previous case may be described in general terms as a reduction of a lease on the ground of fraud, by misrepresentation and concealment in regard to the presence and quality of this mineral in the lands of

No. 197. Torbanehill. But that was not enough. We held that it was not enough merely to set forth misrepresentation or to aver concealment. We required that there should be an averment of the defenders' knowledge of the presence of the mineral within the lands of the pursuers, and not merely that the pursuers should state that the defenders had good ground to believe that the mineral was there. Upon that ground our judgment was mainly rested in disposing of the former case on the point of relevancy. The summons in that action was vague in its averments in regard to this particular transaction. It did not aver knowledge. It said that the defender "was aware." That was a very vague expression. It might have admitted of being explained in the record. But in that case the explanation given in the record was, that the defender "was aware," or "had cause to believe;" and we held that that amounted to no more than this, that, under the word "aware," the pursuer did not intend to assert more than that the defenders "had cause to believe," and so the case stood when we dismissed it.

June 26, 1857.
Gillespie v.
Russel.

The present action proceeds on the ground of positive knowledge as a matter of fact. I so read the record. I find it stated in article 3, that in particular the defenders had made themselves thoroughly acquainted with the nature, quality, and extent of the minerals in the pursuers' lands of Torbanehill.—(Reads articles 3, 4, 5, and 9.)

I read that as a statement that the defenders had ascertained and knew, as matter of fact, that that mineral was in the lands of Torbanehill. It cannot be read in any other sense. Now that ascertainment never was averred in the former action, neither in the summons nor record. I do not mean to say whether the equivocal expression in the summons in the former action might or might not have been explained to mean knowledge. But according to the explanation given of it, it was not meant to aver knowledge. I therefore hold that this action is laid upon the averment of actual knowledge, on the allegation that the defender had ascertained, and knew, as a matter of fact, that the mineral substance in question was within the pursuers' lands, and that they had falsely and fraudulently stated and represented that no such gas coal as this mineral substance was in the lands of Torbanehill, while they all the time knew "that the foresaid most valuable gas coal or mineral substance existed in great quantities in said lands, and was capable of being worked and turned out to immense advantage and profit. These false and fraudulent statements and representations were made for the purpose of deceiving and misleading the pursuers, and inducing them to grant the lease under reduction."

That being so, I think that this action is not substantially the same with the former action. I think, as regards the criticism upon the record—that kind of criticism which was raised under the second and third pleas of the former action, and which was discussed with reference to the fourth plea—that this summons and this record are essentially different from the summons and record in the former action. The word relevancy is used in two senses, either as a criticism on the record, or in a more general sense as involving questions of law, which may or may not be disposed of before trial, according to circumstances and the expediency of the case. We have had a discussion as to whether there are the same grounds of action, and whether the actions are laid on the same media concludendi, which led to a discussion on the nature of these things, and as to the meaning of medium concludendi, which last seemed to be the most difficult part of the discussion. I do not pretend to give a definition of these matters. "Ground of action" is a phrase used in various senses, and I do not think it necessary to solve the point whether "ground of action," and "medium concludendi," are the same things. "Ground of action" is a very general phrase. This action is laid on the same grounds as the previous action, inasmuch as both actions are laid on the ground of fraud in regard to a statement as to this mineral, but they are not both laid on the same medium concludendi in one sense, because the summonses are different. If I were to draw a distinction between these two things, I would say that the grounds of action more resemble the major proposition, and the medium concludendi the minor proposition. But the phrases are used loosely, and especially "ground of action." Here, if we are to look at the circumstances which are alleged as bringing out the general averment of fraud, and leading to the conclusion for reduction, I think that the circumnces averred are different from those averred in the former action. Therefore I No. 197.

 of opinion that the plea of res judicata is here not well-founded.

There still remains the question of relevancy. I do not think it necessary to June 26, 1857.
 much upon that point. I had occasion to remark, when comparing the two Gillespie v.
Russel.

ords in the two actions, that the word relevancy is used in two senses. It is d with reference to criticism on the record, which was very much the mean-in which it was used in regard to the second and third pleas sustained in the ner action. In that sense, I have no doubt that this action is relevant; that that it expressly sets forth these facts, that there was positive knowledge on part of the defenders of the existence of the mineral in Torbanehill, and fraudu-and intentional misrepresentation and concealment by them of that fact, with view of inducing a certain result. All that is distinctly averred; and therefore n of opinion that as regards any criticism of that kind, there is an essential erence between the two actions. But relevancy has another more general and ortant meaning; as regards the general aspect of the action, and involving it may sometimes be the whole matter of the action, whether the averments be as to support the conclusion. In every case where there is not proof or inquiry the facts, the whole question is sometimes one of relevancy. There are some s which must go to proof on matters of fact, in which are involved questions w and relevancy. These questions of law or relevancy may afterwards be deter-ed. Again, these questions are sometimes settled before going to trial, but some-es it is expedient not to do so. Now, I think the fourth plea of law here is one of kind, but the Lord Ordinary has not disposed of it, and I am not inclined to ose of it at this stage of the case. It is not a question of law or relevancy that ures to be disposed of before going to trial, but which may be disposed of afterds. I do not think that the Lord Ordinary, in his interlocutor, means to do e than deal with the criticism of the case. But his interlocutor, as it stands, ht tend to cut off the larger question of relevancy which remains behind, and efore I would be disposed to clear away that difficulty, by modifying the Lord inary's finding; at the same time that I see that the criticism on this record not preclude this case from going to trial.

ORD IVORY.—I substantially concur in the views of your Lordship; and as this is to go to trial, according to the result of the opinions of the Court, perhaps e should be said at present. The question of relevancy may never occur for decision of the Court or of the jury at all. On the question of res judicata, I e no difficulty in agreeing with your Lordship. There is considerable nicety delicacy in being called upon to lay down with precision the whole prines on which this doctrine of res judicata is founded. But the question comes is, is the judgment in the former action such a judgment as we would be called a to pronounce in this action? When the case was formerly here, the reading he whole Court of the record on which the judgment was pronounced, was, that tever might have been the purpose or intention of the party, the case had not a set forth as a case of alleged fraud on actual knowledge. It was rather a of alleged belief and speculation; and actual knowledge was a fact which was t strongly maintained by the defender as not coming within the case at all. I ld call attention to two passages in the argument, as I have it noted down, h shows what was the view of the bar in supporting the defence. (His Lord-then read from his notes to the following effect:—Mr Young, for the defender, tained there was no averment of a false statement which imported that any g had been said by the defender which came up to fraud dans causam con- trahi. Such a case would require a most distinct and precise statement to come o that. Mr Penney, on the other hand, in supporting the same side, said, it is the record means that Mr Russel knew that the mineral was there, and that Gillespie did not. This is not in the record. If it was, it would fundamentally ge matters as there set forth; and, in going on to criticise the statements of the uer, he said, as to the condescendence, article 4, that it does not amount to verment of knowledge.)

he Lord Ordinary has made a very pertinent remark as to the reading of both
 s. He says that the defenders took the most rigorous construction of the rd in the previous action, and that now they are inclined to take the very rse. That is very natural. But when I read the judgment and opinions of

No. 197. all the Judges in construing the record, as it was formerly presented to the Court, the former judgment excluded the element which now makes the relevancy in the present case. It held the record defective as not averring knowledge. If the record had averred knowledge, the judgment would have been the same as we are now going to pronounce. But how the judgment we then pronounced upon a different averment of facts should be res judicata in this action, I cannot understand. The two cases are essentially different. It has been said that the ground of action, or medium concludendi, is the same in both actions. I shall not attempt to define the phrase "ground of action," or "medium concludendi." They are not well defined in the books; but the substantial question is the identity of the judgment formerly pronounced with that now asked for. If that identity does not occur, there is no room for the plea of res judicata. It is said that a pursuer when he brings his case is equally liable to the plea of "competent and omitted" with the defender. In some respects it is so, but in others it is not. Competent and omitted is not necessarily applied to matters that have been dealt with before. But in a question of res judicata, it is the question of identity alone that you have to deal with; and wherever identity is discovered in the cases, I do not see how competent and omitted can apply.

June 26, 1857.
Gillespie v.
Russel.

With regard to the relevancy, I should have been very well pleased if it had suited the views of the Court that we should now have pronounced a judgment upon it. But as it is thought expedient not to do so, I entirely acquiesce in the course proposed by your Lordship; for it lets the case go to a jury without being hampered with a judgment on the relevancy. And if it comes back to the Court, it will come in a better shape; for it will not be upon a hypothetical assumption of the facts, but upon a bill of exceptions, with reference to the notes of the Judge in point of fact, which will make it a matter of no difficulty in determining the relevancy.

LORD CURRIEHILL—I am of opinion that this action is not barred by res judicata. In the first place, what was concluded for in the action, in which the judgment was pronounced upon which that plea is founded, is different from what is concluded for in the present action. In the former, the pursuer concluded that the lease in question, "in so far at least as it includes, or can be held to include, the foresaid valuable mineral substance of an argillaceous or other nature, which the defenders have been working, outputting, and selling under the name of gas, parrot, or cannel coal, or Boghead or Bathgate coal," ought and should be reduced "to the extent and effect foresaid;" that it should be found and declared "that the defenders have not, and never had, any right to work, output, and sell the said valuable mineral substance;" and that they should be decerned and ordained to pay such sum as should be found "to be the value of the said mineral substance so put out, worked, and sold by the defenders," or that they should hold count and reckoning "for the same," and be decerned to pay the balance on the said state of accounts. Although the rescisory conclusion was qualified with the words "at least," there was not in that summons any conclusion for reduction of the lease, except that part of it which included this particular substance, and the declaratory and petitory conclusions were expressly limited to that substance. Quoad ultra this lease, and the operations of the defenders under it, were left unchallenged; and it would have remained in full force and effect even had decree been pronounced upon all the conclusions in terms of the libel. And hence the practical effect of that action, if it had been successful would have been, not to have extinguished the lease, but only to have remodelled it. And, accordingly, one of the grounds upon which I held, when the judgment in that action was pronounced, that the pursuers had not averred facts relevant and sufficient to support the conclusions of that libel was, that these conclusions were of such a peculiar and anomalous description.

What the present action concludes for is,—1st, that the lease should be wholly rescinded, and declared to be null and void; and, 2d, that the defenders should pay to the pursuers the value of the said minerals, (meaning, as appears from the antecedent context, all the coal, ironstone, iron ore, limestone, and fireclay) put out, worked, and sold by the defenders from the pursuer's lands of Tortanahill, under colour of the lease, prior to the date of citation, or should count and reckon with the pursuer for the same, and pay the balance appearing on such accounting. These conclusions are essentially different in their nature and extent from those in the ner action; and in that action no such decree as is now sued for could have been competently pronounced. And hence it does not follow that the defenders are entitled to be absolved from the present action, merely because they were absolved from the former action as laid.

No. 197.

June 26, 1857.

Gillespie v.

Russel.

Further, the grounds of action as set forth in the two summonses and records are the same; for, although in both cases the grounds of challenge are stated generally to be fraudulent concealment, and fraudulent misrepresentation, yet the facts which are alleged to have been so concealed and misrepresented in the one action, are different from those which are alleged to have been so concealed and misrepresented in the other.

That in the former action (according to the true meaning of the record in it) the defenders were accused of having fraudulently concealed was, that they knew the mineral which they had been working in Boghead was of unusually good quality and great value, and that they had reason to believe that the same mineral might be found in Torbanehill. But what in the present action they are accused of having fraudulently concealed is, not that they had such a mere speculative belief that this valuable mineral might be found in Torbanehill, but that they had actual knowledge that it actually did exist, and might be wrought in these lands. And the fraudulent misrepresentation of which the defenders were accused in the former action, was said to have consisted in their asserting to the pursuer that the quality and the value of the mineral which was so found in Boghead, and believed to be in Torbanehill, were less than the defenders knew them to be. But the fraudulent misrepresentation of which they are accused in the present action is said to have consisted in their having asserted that, de facto, no such mineral exists in Torbanehill, although they were in actual knowledge of its existence there.

The things alleged to have been concealed and misrepresented in the two actions being thus so very different, a judgment as to the relevancy of the one set of allegations is not res judicata as to the relevancy of the other; and the question as to the relevancy of the accusations in the present action must be dealt with on its merits.

The question thus raised appears to me to be a very large and difficult one in law of mutual contracts; and, as we were told from the bar, it has never yet been authoritatively decided. It involves the important inquiry,—how far the law entitles a party, in contracting with another, in circumstances such as those in which the lease under challenge was granted, to rely upon the statements made by that opposite party, without making inquiry as to their truth? If we are to determine this question at this stage of the proceedings, I would require further argument upon it at the bar. But I think that the Court, in the exercise of its discretion, should first ascertain the facts of the case, before entering upon the discussion of such a new and important question of law; because it may eventually be found that the question of law, in the aspect in which it now presents itself in the record, does not arise in the actual facts of the case, and may never require to be determined in this action, and that the actual facts may give rise to quite a different question of law. I therefore entirely concur in the proposal to recall in hoc statu the Lord Ordinary's finding as to relevancy, and to have the case tried by jury, without at present deciding any question of law.

ORD DEAS.—There are two questions decided by the Lord Ordinary,—the question of res judicata and the question of relevancy. It was argued for the pursuer that if the one action be relevant and the other not, this of itself was a sufficient difference to prevent the applicability of the plea of res judicata. I do not think any of your Lordships adopt this part of the argument, and I certainly cannot concur in it. We must go further, and inquire whether the nature and grounds of the two actions be or be not the same; and it is upon the result of this inquiry that the applicability of the plea of res judicata must depend.

Now, in inquiring into the nature and grounds of the two actions, I look, in the present instance, at the summonses, including, of course, under that name the conclusions annexed thereto; and, from these, I find that both actions are actions for reduction of the lease in dispute, having petitory conclusions consequent upon process in the reduction,—with this distinction only, that, whereas the first action is directed to reduction of the lease in toto, or, alternatively, to its reduction of the particular substance in dispute, the second action omits this last alterna-

No. 197. statu, the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary reclaimed against; and remit to his Lordship to ordain the production to be satisfied, reserving the preliminary defences to be discussed along with the merits; and to appoint a record to be made up and closed, and to proceed with the cause.”

June 26, 1857.
Gillespie v.
Russel.

A record was then made up and closed, and on 26th February 1857, the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—“ Repels the plea of res judicata stated for the defenders: Finds that the pursuers have alleged facts relevant to go to issue; and appoints the pursuers to lodge such issues as they propose within ten days from this date.” *

it was ‘not relevant and sufficient to support the conclusions.’ The defenders then read the averments in the former record, so as to confine them within the narrowest limits of the strictest construction. They now seek to read the same averments, so as to extend them to the widest range of liberal construction. The Lord Ordinary has endeavoured to ascertain the true meaning of the pursuers’ averments in both actions. On a reasonable construction of the words used, he thinks that there are averments in the present summons which are not within those in the former action, but are new; and particularly, that the averments in the 3d and 9th articles, taken together, are new, and, therefore, he is of opinion that this action is ‘otherwise laid,’ and is consequently not excluded by the absolvitor from the former action ‘as laid.’

“ On these grounds, and without at present indicating any opinion on the relevancy and sufficiency of the averments in this action, the plea of res judicata has been repelled.”

* “ NOTE.—This action, brought by the pursuers Mr and Mrs Gillespie, for reduction of the lease of the minerals of Torbanehill, on the head of fraudulent concealment and misrepresentation, has been resisted on two grounds, urged by the defenders as sufficient to dispose of it without inquiry into the facts. In the first place, the defenders plead res judicata, in respect of the judgment of the Court in the previous action. In the second place, they plead that the averments in the present action are not relevant to support its conclusions.

“ In considering the plea of res judicata, it is necessary to attend to the circumstances in which it is stated.

“ The former action was disposed of by a judgment on the relevancy, and the defenders were ‘assoilzied from the action as laid,’—the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary having been slightly varied by the Court, in order so to express the absolvitor. There was, of course, no investigation into the facts; and there was no decision on the relevancy of any averments except those made on that record. The argument of the defenders in the previous action was, that knowledge on their part, of the existence of this coal in Torbanehill as of an ascertained fact, apart from mere speculation or inference from its presence in Boghead, was not then alleged; and the decision of the Court rested mainly on this defect—this absence of any averment of the defenders’ actual knowledge. But now, the argument of the defenders is, that their actual knowledge of the existence of this coal in Torbanehill, was really averred in the former action; and therefore, that it is not matter of new averment in the present action. The former case was decided on the first view of the averments which was then successfully maintained by the defenders. Actual knowledge as of an ascertained fact was held by the Court, on considering the record, not to be averred, and on that ground, taken in necessary connection with the manner in which misrepresentation was alleged, the defenders were assoilzied from ‘the action as laid.’ Can the defenders now succeed in throwing out this action on the ground (in direct opposition to their previous pleading), that actual knowledge on their part was really averred in the former action? The Lord Ordinary, though much impressed by the legal difficulties so ably urged by the defenders, is yet of opinion that this ought not to be permitted.

“ After a renewed and careful comparison of the averments in the two actions the Lord Ordinary is still of opinion that there are such differences as to distinguish the present from the former action, to make it, in important respects, a new action and so to save it from being excluded by the plea of res judicata, founded on the decree of absolvitor from the former action ‘as laid.’ If this action is laid on ground

Against this interlocutor the defenders reclaimed, and pleaded;—That this and the former action were identical, in respect, (1), both related to

No. 197.
—
June 26, 1857.
Gillespie v.
Russel.

fairly and substantially different from those stated on the former record, then it is not so laid as to be within the absolutor from the former action 'as laid.' This was the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, when, on 3d July 1856, he repelled the plea of res judicata, as then urged. The record has since been closed on the revised papers, the statements of fact and pleas in law have been completed and adjusted, and the plea of res judicata is now urged to exclude this action. The Lord Ordinary having had the benefit of most ingenious and elaborate argument, in which the whole subject of res judicata has been amply discussed, has not seen reason to change the opinions he formerly expressed, and to which he now refers.

"Two points have been especially pressed on his attention. The first is—that in the condescendence annexed to the summons in the former action, the pursuers averred that the defenders 'were well aware' that the mineral substance found in Boghead was to be found in large quantity in the lands of Torbanehill; and that the addition, made on revisal, to the words 'were well aware,' viz., 'or had sufficient grounds for believing,' did not so derogate from the previous averment as to prevent its being a proper averment of knowledge made in 'the action as laid,' from which the defenders were assoilzied. This difference of expression between the summons and the revised condescendence does not appear to have been brought under the notice of the Court in the former action; and, as already explained, the cause was decided on an analysis of the record, and on the footing of knowledge not being alleged. But even taking the words as they stand in the summons, and reading them in connection with the other statements there made, the question still remains, Do they amount to an averment of knowledge of the existence of this coal in Torbanehill as a fact ascertained, and not merely as the result of speculation and inference from the workings at Boghead? The Lord Ordinary thinks that, even reading the summons by itself, there was no averment of such actual knowledge. It amounted only to this, that the defenders having worked and sold the Boghead coal, were, from the results of that working, aware, as matter of inference or deduction, that the same mineral was likely to be found in Torbanehill. But the summons cannot be separated from the record: the whole record should be considered; and it was carefully considered by the Court, and the result of that consideration was, that, not from the conclusions of the summons generally, but 'from the action as laid,' the defenders were assoilzied.

"The second point was—that the additional averments made in this action might have been made in the former action under the summons, and therefore that they are not new, to the effect of being now competent.

"It is said that a new ground of action could not have been added;—these averments could have been added;—therefore, these averments do not amount to a new ground of action. This argument is very plausible, and, when viewed with reference to the opinion of Lord Corehouse in Campbell v. Stewart, 20th Feb. 1838, has been felt by the Lord Ordinary to be forcible; and it is not without hesitation and difficulty that he has refused effect to it. The case of Campbell v. Stewart was a case of a new action after a verdict for the defender had been returned, and had been applied by the Court. The defender had, after verdict, been assoilzied from the conclusions of the libel, under reservation only of the effect of a judicial minute, which did not include the point sought to be raised in the supplementary action. The pursuer's case had been put in issue, and decided on evidence. The only points which the pursuer desired to keep open were reserved in the minute, and the Court would not allow a different point, which had not been reserved, to be brought forward in a new action. That is a very different case from the present, where the truth of the pursuers' allegations has never been investigated, and where the averments now made have never been judicially considered.

"To say that the new averments might have been made in the former action, and must therefore be now excluded, is just to urge the plea of 'competent and omitted' against the pursuers. Take the case of Lord Strathmore, 24th May 1833. The argument now urged would have applied to that case;—the new matter might have been there stated in the first action. The plea of vitiation, as a reason of reduction, ~~is~~, according to common style, stated in the first action by Lord Strath-

No. 197. the same transaction ; (2), In both the defenders were charged with fraudulent concealment and misrepresentation with reference to that transaction ;

June 26, 1857.
Gillespie v.
Russel.

more. It would, of course, have been competent to allege on record, as matter of fact, that the deed was actually vitiated in substantialibus. But, notwithstanding this, the Court sustained a new action, laid on the averment of actual vitiation, and adhered to Lord Moncreiff's interlocutor, repelling the plea of res judicata, on the ground, as stated by him, that 'there cannot be res judicata on any particular question or ground of action where that question or ground has never been truly or in plain reality raised and brought into discussion between the parties.' So also in the case of Lord Macdonald, 26th May 1840, a new action was sustained and the plea of res judicata was repelled, the exception of 'competent and omitted' being found not applicable to a pursuer under such circumstances. Although, therefore, the argument of the defenders has a syllogistic aspect, and although it derives some force from the rules of pleading recognised in our procedure under the Judicature Act, still it is only another and a very ingenious mode of applying the plea of competent and omitted, to a case where it is not appropriate.

"The case which the pursuers of this action now state, both as regards the alleged knowledge of the defenders, the mode by which they attained that knowledge, and the nature of their alleged misrepresentations made in that knowledge, is one on which hitherto there has been no judicial deliverance. If such a case were excluded without inquiry, on the plea of res judicata, the forms of law would operate to the exclusion of justice.

"Looking to the averments on this record, and especially to the 3d, 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th, and 9th articles in the revised condescendence, which must be considered together, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the pursuers have now made averments relevant to go to issue.

"They now allege—1st, That the defenders, when they entered into the lease, had ascertained, and knew as a fact, that this valuable gas coal was in the hands of Torbanehill in abundance, and was capable of being wrought to great advantage ; 2d, That the pursuers were ignorant of that fact ; 3d, That the defenders, being in the knowledge of that important fact by actual ascertainment thereof, not only concealed their knowledge, and disguised their object during the negotiations, but 'did falsely and fraudulently state and represent that no such gas coal existed in Torbanehill ;' and, 4th, That by such false and fraudulent representations made knowingly contrary to the fact, they induced the pursuers to grant the lease.

"This is not now stated as a case of speculative conjecture or expectation, nor as a case of mere concealment of opinion, or even concealment of a certain kind of knowledge derived from experiments on Boghead coal. It is stated as a case of fraud—a case of wilful false statement, and misrepresentation of fact, made in order to deceive, and with the effect of deceiving, the pursuers.

"There may be great difficulty in establishing such a case by evidence, and there are many presumptions against it ; but the Lord Ordinary is unable to see how the case, as now put, can be disposed of at once and without inquiry. It rests on averments of intentional deceit, of wilful falsehood, of fraus dans causam contractui. These are very strong statements. Their truth must be assumed, in this question of relevancy, for the pursuers undertake to prove them, and if they are all true, then there is no authority for supporting against challenge by reduction, a contract obtained by such fraud, to the great prejudice of the party deceived. The Lord Ordinary found the former action not relevant, but he feels compelled to take a different view of the action now before him, which is different in essential particulars ; and he has been unable to discover in the opinions of the Judges of the First Division on the former case, anything opposed to the view now taken under altered circumstances.

"Where both parties are on an equality as to knowledge, mere superiority of skill or judgment is of no consequence. Where parties are not on an equality, but one party has acquired actual knowledge of an important fact not known to the other, and does not state that fact, they may still transact for a sale, or for a lease, because there is no duty of disclosure. But where one party has obtained knowledge of an important fact of which the other party is ignorant, and, in regard to that matter, wilfully misrepresents the fact, in order to deceive, and with the effect

No. 197.

June 26, 1857.
Gillespie v.
Russel.

(3), In both the subject of the alleged fraudulent concealment and misrepresentation was the existence of the gas coal in question in Torbanehill, and the quality of it; (4), In both the pursuers averred their own ignorance of the existence of this mineral, and of the quality of it; (5), In both it was alleged that the defenders' real object in negotiating for a lease and obtaining it, was to get possession of this coal, while they pretended as a blind that they desired a variety of other minerals included in the lease. The present action was said to differ from the former, in respect, (1), in the first action the defenders' actual knowledge, as distinguished from speculative opinion, or "having good reason to believe" in the existence of this mineral in Torbanehill, and the quality of it, was not averred, while in this present action such actual knowledge was averred; (2), That in the present action there was a more satisfactory statement by the pursuers of the cause of the defenders' knowledge than in the first; and (3), That in the first action the fraudulent concealment and misrepresentation by the defenders of the facts as known to them, were not distinctly averred, while in this present action they were distinctly averred. But comparing the two summonses, the averment of knowledge in the first action was as explicit as in the present action. In the former it was, "you were well aware," or "had sufficient ground for believing" that such a mineral existed. In this action it is, "you knew that it existed," "you were perfectly aware." There was therefore no difference in the two actions in this respect. The words in the former action, which prejudiced the case of the pursuers, were here omitted. In other respects, the summonses were identical.

2. As to the cause of knowledge: article 3 of the present action, which alone contained anything upon the subject, said that this knowledge was gained "by inquiry, experiment, skilful analysis, and otherwise." "Inquiry" was impossible, because the pursuers averred that the existence of the coal was only known to the defenders; therefore, that being left out of view, there remained only "experiment" and "skilful analysis." No particulars were given. The previous action stated what the experiment and skilful analysis was. It could not be said, therefore, that the statement in this action was more satisfactory than in the other. If it was meant to aver that another mineral than what was set forth in the lease was the subject of experiment, that ought to have been stated. There was nothing in the revised condescendence in this case which could not have been introduced under the original summons. That was a good test whether this was an action on new grounds or not.

Again, by the Judicature Act, the pursuer was bound to set forth all the facts of the case. Therefore the previous judgment must be presumed to have proceeded on a statement of all the facts of the case, and being adverse to the pursuer, that implied that there were no facts to support his case, that he had not got evidence sufficient to do so. The question came to be, was there anything material or immaterial in this record which might not have been dealt with under the original record? In the view of the Lord Ordinary, if the Court decide against the relevancy of this case, the pursuers would bring another, and perhaps still another action more skilfully framed, of deceiving, so that the contract is induced by the false representation, such a contract cannot stand. Ex dolo non oritur contractus. On the effect of direct deception (as distinct from the mere use of the advantage of superior knowledge) under such circumstances, reference has been made to Sugden on the Law of Vendors and Purchasers, p. 5; and to the case of Turner v. Harvey, 1 Jac. Rep. 169. That was a case where one party to a transaction of sale had obtained knowledge of a material fact of which the other party was ignorant. The remarks of Lord Eldon on the effect of even the slightest attempt to mislead or deceive by false statement, under such circumstances, are very important."

No. 197. in endless repetition, and so reduce the question to one of expenses. When an action related to the same subject, had the same conclusions, and the same medium concludendi as a previous action, the plea of res judicata applied.

June 26, 1857.
Gillespie v.
Russel.

The pursuers pleaded ;—That the ground of action alleged in this case was not speculative knowledge or belief on the part of the defenders, but positive knowledge that this mineral was in the lands of Torbanehill.¹

This action was to be considered by itself and not by comparison with the previous action. It was sufficiently alleged (art. 3 and 4) that before and during the negotiations as to the lease, the defenders knew that there were seams of this mineral in Torbanehill.

Taking these statements in connection with articles 9 and 10, the question was, how far did such allegation, as between seller and purchaser, or lessor and lessee, operate to void the contract? If knowledge, as matter of fact, was averred, the means of acquiring that knowledge was of no consequence in a question of relevancy, for the knowledge may be proved, and yet it may be impossible to prove how that knowledge was acquired. The averments on that subject essentially distinguished this case from the previous one, and the previous judgment therefore could not be pleaded as res judicata in this action.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case we had an argument on the question of res judicata before the record was closed. We thought it desirable to close the record before disposing of that plea. We have now heard an argument on the whole matter, which leads us to inquire what was the judgment in the previous action betwixt the pursuers and the defenders. That judgment, as pronounced by the Lord Ordinary, originally stood thus :—“Repels the first plea in law stated for the defenders, but finds the pursuers have not averred facts relevant and sufficient to support the conclusions of the libel, and, therefore, sustains the 2d and 3d pleas for the defenders, and assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the action,” &c. The first plea in law for the defenders which was thus repelled, was a plea of res judicata in respect of the verdict and judgment in the previous action of declarator. It was out of the question to give effect to that plea. That interlocutor, it will be observed, after disposing of the plea of res judicata, finds that the pursuers had not averred facts relevant and sufficient to support the conclusions of the libel, and sustains the 2d and 3d pleas for the defenders. The 2d and 3d pleas for the defenders so sustained are thus stated in the record in that action :—“(2.) The statements in the condescendence are irrelevant, and insufficient to support the conclusions of the action, and, generally, the action is irrelevantly and insufficiently laid. (3.) In particular, the condescendence contains no relevant allegation of facts to shew fraud on the part of the defenders, and to support the reductive conclusions upon that ground.” The Lord Ordinary did not dispose of the 4th plea, which was a plea of some importance in the case, and which also involved the question of relevancy. It was as follows :—“4. The action is irrelevant, and cannot be maintained, in respect, 1st, there was no duty of disclosure on the part of the defenders in regard to any of the matters which they are alleged to have concealed from the pursuers ; and, 2d, the defenders had no peculiar knowledge, or peculiar means of knowledge, in regard to any of the matters which they are alleged to have either misrepresented to the pursuers, or concealed from them, and it is not relevantly alleged that they had.”

The Court, in dealing with that interlocutor, made a variation upon it and pronounced this interlocutor :—“The Lords, having considered the reclaiming notes for the parties, and heard counsel, refuse the desire of the notes, and adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary reclaimed against, with this variation, that instead of assoilzieing the defenders from the conclusion of the action, the Lords assoilzie the defenders from the action as laid.” Now in introducing these words, “from the action as laid,” I do not understand that it was the intention of the Court to decide anything in regard to the plea of res judicata, either that it should be excluded, or that it should be kept open, but to leave that question for discussion in any future action. Such was the judgment pronounced. Now, what was the action from which the Court so assoilzied the defenders? The action was for reduction of this lease of the minerals in the lands of Torbanehill. It was an action for reduction of the lease of these minerals, on the ground of fraud—and specially with reference to the mineral that has been the subject of so much discussion. The action was based on the ground of substantial error, as apart from fraud. In the condescendence, it is said:—"In entering into said lease or missive of agreement for a lease, the pursuers laboured under error in substantialibus; they were in entire ignorance of the nature and value of the mineral in question; and in place of being aware of its true nature and value, they were led by the defenders to believe that the only coal or substance in the lands of the nature of coal, or suitable for any one of the purposes for which coal was applied, was of inferior quality and value. Had they known or been aware of the true state of matters, they would not have consented to the terms of the foresaid missive of lease, nor entered into the same."

¹ St Leonard's Vendors, &c., p. 5 (Ed. 1846).

No. 197.
June 26, 1857.
Gillespie v.
Russel.

The conclusions of that former action were also peculiar. The judgment went very much on the ground of that peculiarity. The conclusions of that action deserve notice again. They were to this effect:—"That for the reasons and causes set forth in the condescendence, the defenders should be ordained to exhibit the missive of lease "to be seen and considered by our said Lords, and to hear and see the same, with all that has followed or may follow thereupon, in so far at least as it is or can be held to include a valuable mineral substance of an argillaceous or other nature, which the said defenders have been working, outputting, and selling under the name of gas, or parrot, or cannel coal, or Boghead, or Bathgate gas coal, reduced, &c.; and the pursuers reponed and restored thereagainst in integrum, at least to the extent and effect foresaid."

I have already stated that in that action fraud was alleged with reference to the defenders' knowledge of the existence of the mineral in Torbanehill, and one ground of reduction was applicable to such fraud. There was another and more general ground of reduction in respect of essential error. The pleas in law, as stated in the closed record in that action, were as follows:—"1. The object and media concludendi of the present action being entirely different from those of the previous action of declarator between the same parties, that previous action forms no bar to the present action. 2. So far as the said missive of agreement can be held to include the valuable mineral substance which is worked and sold by the defenders under the name of gas, parrot, or cannel coal, or Boghead or Bathgate gas, parrot, or cannel coal, the said lease, or missive of agreement for a lease, ought to be reduced and set aside on the ground of fraudulent misrepresentation by the defenders of material facts and circumstances as condescended on. 3. So far as the said missive can be held to include the said valuable mineral substance, it is reducible, in respect the pursuers were induced to enter into the lease, so far as the said mineral is concerned, by the fraudulent concealment by the defenders of essential facts, which, in the circumstances, they were bound not to conceal from the pursuers. 4. The lease or missive of agreement is, in the circumstances, reducible, on the ground of error in substantialibus on the part of the pursuers."

The action, therefore, so far as laid on the ground of fraud, concluded for reduction of the lease only in so far as it related to that mineral substance. The conclusions for total reduction of the lease were laid upon substantial error. The action was therefore altogether of a peculiar character. But the main point here is to consider whether the question raised in this action is or is not substantially and legally to be regarded as the same question that we dealt with in the former action, as in an action laid generally upon fraud. Fraud is a very general word. It does not follow that because two actions are laid on fraud they are the same; nor that, being so laid, for the purpose of arriving at the same result, they are the same. The general character of the fraud, and especially the grounds of fraud, must both be looked at; and for that purpose we must look to the summons, and also to the condescendence. Now the previous case may be described in general terms as a reduction of a lease on the ground of fraud, by misrepresentation and concealment in regard to the presence and quality of this mineral in the lands of

No. 197. Torbanehill. But that was not enough. We held that it was not enough merely to set forth misrepresentation or to aver concealment. We required that there should be an averment of the defenders' knowledge of the presence of the mineral within the lands of the pursuers, and not merely that the pursuers should state that the defenders had good ground to believe that the mineral was there. Upon that ground our judgment was mainly rested in disposing of the former case on the point of relevancy. The summons in that action was vague in its averments in regard to this particular transaction. It did not aver knowledge. It said that the defender "was aware." That was a very vague expression. It might have admitted of being explained in the record. But in that case the explanation given in the record was, that the defender "was aware," or "had cause to believe;" and we held that that amounted to no more than this, that, under the word "aware," the pursuer did not intend to assert more than that the defenders "had cause to believe," and so the case stood when we dismissed it.

June 26, 1857.
Gillespie v.
Russel.

The present action proceeds on the ground of positive knowledge as a matter of fact. I so read the record. I find it stated in article 3, that in particular the defenders had made themselves thoroughly acquainted with the nature, quality, and extent of the minerals in the pursuers' lands of Torbanehill.—(Reads articles 3, 4, 5, and 9.)

I read that as a statement that the defenders had ascertained and knew, as matter of fact, that that mineral was in the lands of Torbanehill. It cannot be read in any other sense. Now that ascertainment never was averred in the former action, neither in the summons nor record. I do not mean to say whether the equivocal expression in the summons in the former action might or might not have been explained to mean knowledge. But according to the explanation given of it, it was not meant to aver knowledge. I therefore hold that this action is laid upon the averment of actual knowledge, on the allegation that the defender had ascertained, and knew, as a matter of fact, that the mineral substance in question was within the pursuers' lands, and that they had falsely and fraudulently stated and represented that no such gas coal as this mineral substance was in the lands of Torbanehill, while they all the time knew "that the foresaid most valuable gas coal or mineral substance existed in great quantities in said lands, and was capable of being worked and turned out to immense advantage and profit. These false and fraudulent statements and representations were made for the purpose of deceiving and misleading the pursuers, and inducing them to grant the lease under reduction."

That being so, I think that this action is not substantially the same with the former action. I think, as regards the criticism upon the record—that kind of criticism which was raised under the second and third pleas of the former action, and which was discussed with reference to the fourth plea—that this summons and this record are essentially different from the summons and record in the former action. The word relevancy is used in two senses, either as a criticism on the record, or in a more general sense as involving questions of law, which may or may not be disposed of before trial, according to circumstances and the expediency of the case. We have had a discussion as to whether there are the same grounds of action, and whether the actions are laid on the same media concludendi, which led to a discussion on the nature of these things, and as to the meaning of medium concludendi, which last seemed to be the most difficult part of the discussion. I do not pretend to give a definition of these matters. "Ground of action" is a phrase used in various senses, and I do not think it necessary to solve the point whether "ground of action," and "medium concludendi," are the same things. "Ground of action" is a very general phrase. This action is laid on the same grounds as the previous action, inasmuch as both actions are laid on the ground of fraud in regard to a statement as to this mineral, but they are not both laid on the same medium concludendi in one sense, because the summonses are different. If I were to draw a distinction between these two things, I would say that the grounds of action more resemble the major proposition, and the medium concludendi the minor proposition. But the phrases are used loosely, and especially "ground of action." Here, if we are to look at the circumstances which are alleged as bringing out the general averment of fraud, and leading to the conclusion for reduction, I think that the circumstances averred are different from those averred in the former action. Therefore I am of opinion that the plea of res judicata is here not well-founded. No. 197.

There still remains the question of relevancy. I do not think it necessary to say much upon that point. I had occasion to remark, when comparing the two records in the two actions, that the word relevancy is used in two senses. It is used with reference to criticism on the record, which was very much the meaning in which it was used in regard to the second and third pleas sustained in the former action. In that sense, I have no doubt that this action is relevant; that is, that it expressly sets forth these facts, that there was positive knowledge on the part of the defenders of the existence of the mineral in Torbanehill, and fraudulent and intentional misrepresentation and concealment by them of that fact, with the view of inducing a certain result. All that is distinctly averred; and therefore I am of opinion that as regards any criticism of that kind, there is an essential difference between the two actions. But relevancy has another more general and important meaning; as regards the general aspect of the action, and involving what may sometimes be the whole matter of the action, whether the averments be such as to support the conclusion. In every case where there is not proof or inquiry into the facts, the whole question is sometimes one of relevancy. There are some cases which must go to proof on matters of fact, in which are involved questions of law and relevancy. These questions of law or relevancy may afterwards be determined. Again, these questions are sometimes settled before going to trial, but sometimes it is expedient not to do so. Now, I think the fourth plea of law here is one of that kind, but the Lord Ordinary has not disposed of it, and I am not inclined to dispose of it at this stage of the case. It is not a question of law or relevancy that requires to be disposed of before going to trial, but which may be disposed of afterwards. I do not think that the Lord Ordinary, in his interlocutor, means to do more than deal with the criticism of the case. But his interlocutor, as it stands, might tend to cut off the larger question of relevancy which remains behind, and therefore I would be disposed to clear away that difficulty, by modifying the Lord Ordinary's finding; at the same time that I see that the criticism on this record will not preclude this case from going to trial.

June 26, 1857.
Gillespie v.
Russel.

LORD IVORY.—I substantially concur in the views of your Lordship; and as this case is to go to trial, according to the result of the opinions of the Court, perhaps little should be said at present. The question of relevancy may never occur for the decision of the Court or of the jury at all. On the question of res judicata, I have no difficulty in agreeing with your Lordship. There is considerable nicety and delicacy in being called upon to lay down with precision the whole principles on which this doctrine of res judicata is founded. But the question comes to this, is the judgment in the former action such a judgment as we would be called upon to pronounce in this action? When the case was formerly here, the reading by the whole Court of the record on which the judgment was pronounced, was, that whatever might have been the purpose or intention of the party, the case had not been set forth as a case of alleged fraud on actual knowledge. It was rather a case of alleged belief and speculation; and actual knowledge was a fact which was most strongly maintained by the defender as not coming within the case at all. I would call attention to two passages in the argument, as I have it noted down, which shows what was the view of the bar in supporting the defence. (His Lordship then read from his notes to the following effect:—Mr Young, for the defender, maintained there was no averment of a false statement which imported that any thing had been said by the defender which came up to fraud dans causam contractui. Such a case would require a most distinct and precise statement to come up to that. Mr Penney, on the other hand, in supporting the same side, said, it is said the record means that Mr Russel knew that the mineral was there, and that Mr Gillespie did not. This is not in the record. If it was, it would fundamentally change matters as there set forth; and, in going on to criticise the statements of the pursuer, he said, as to the condescendence, article 4, that it does not amount to an averment of knowledge.)

The Lord Ordinary has made a very pertinent remark as to the reading of both cases. He says that the defenders took the most rigorous construction of the record in the previous action, and that now they are inclined to take the very reverse. That is very natural. But when I read the judgment and opinions of

No. 197. all the Judges in construing the record, as it was formerly presented to the Court, the former judgment excluded the element which now makes the relevancy in the present case. It held the record defective as not averring knowledge. If the record had averred knowledge, the judgment would have been the same as we are now going to pronounce. But how the judgment we then pronounced upon a different averment of facts should be res judicata in this action, I cannot understand. The two cases are essentially different. It has been said that the ground of action, or medium concludendi, is the same in both actions. I shall not attempt to define the phrase "ground of action," or "medium concludendi." They are not well defined in the books; but the substantial question is the identity of the judgment formerly pronounced with that now asked for. If that identity does not occur, there is no room for the plea of res judicata. It is said that a pursuer when he brings his case is equally liable to the plea of "competent and omitted" with the defender. In some respects it is so, but in others it is not. Competent and omitted is not necessarily applied to matters that have been dealt with before. But in a question of res judicata, it is the question of identity alone that you have to deal with; and wherever identity is discovered in the cases, I do not see how competent and omitted can apply.

With regard to the relevancy, I should have been very well pleased if it had suited the views of the Court that we should now have pronounced a judgment upon it. But as it is thought expedient not to do so, I entirely acquiesce in the course proposed by your Lordship; for it lets the case go to a jury without being hampered with a judgment on the relevancy. And if it comes back to the Court, it will come in a better shape; for it will not be upon a hypothetical assumption of the facts, but upon a bill of exceptions, with reference to the notes of the Judge in point of fact, which will make it a matter of no difficulty in determining the relevancy.

LORD CURRIEHILL—I am of opinion that this action is not barred by res judicata.

In the first place, what was concluded for in the action, in which the judgment was pronounced upon which that plea is founded, is different from what is concluded for in the present action. In the former, the pursuer concluded that the lease in question, "in so far at least as it includes, or can be held to include, the foresaid valuable mineral substance of an argillaceous or other nature, which the defenders have been working, outputting, and selling under the name of gas, parrot, or cannel coal, or Boghead or Bathgate coal," ought and should be reduced "to the extent and effect foresaid;" that it should be found and declared "that the defenders have not, and never had, any right to work, output, and sell the said valuable mineral substance;" and that they should be decerned and ordained to pay such sum as should be found "to be the value of the said mineral substance so put out, worked, and sold by the defenders," or that they should hold count and reckoning "for the same," and be decerned to pay the balance on the said state of accounts. Although the rescisory conclusion was qualified with the words "at least," there was not in that summons any conclusion for reduction of the lease, except that part of it which included this particular substance, and the declaratory and petitory conclusions were expressly limited to that substance. Quoad ultra this lease, and the operations of the defenders under it, were left unchallenged; and it would have remained in full force and effect even had decree been pronounced upon all the conclusions in terms of the libel. And hence the practical effect of that action, if it had been successful, would have been, not to have extinguished the lease, but only to have remodelled it. And, accordingly, one of the grounds upon which I held, when the judgment in that action was pronounced, that the pursuers had not averred facts relevant and sufficient to support the conclusions of that libel was, that these conclusions were of such a peculiar and anomalous description.

What the present action concludes for is,—1st, that the lease should be wholly rescinded, and declared to be null and void; and, 2d, that the defenders should pay to the pursuers the value of the said minerals, (meaning, as appears from the antecedent context, all the coal, ironstone, iron ore, limestone, and fireclay) put out, worked, and sold by the defenders from the pursuer's lands of Tortanehill, under colour of the lease, prior to the date of citation, or should count and reckon with the pursuer for the same, and pay the balance appearing on such accounting. These conclusions are essentially different in their nature and extent from those in the former action; and in that action no such decree as is now sued for could have been competently pronounced. And hence it does not follow that the defenders are entitled to be assoilzied from the present action, merely because they were assoilzied from the former action as laid.

June 26, 1857.
Gillespie v.
Russel.

No. 197.
June 26, 1857.
Gillespie v.
Russel.

Farther, the grounds of action as set forth in the two summonses and records are not the same; for, although in both cases the grounds of challenge are stated generally to be fraudulent concealment, and fraudulent misrepresentation, yet the things which are alleged to have been so concealed and misrepresented in the one action, are different from those which are alleged to have been so concealed and misrepresented in the other.

What in the former action (according to the true meaning of the record in it) the defenders were accused of having fraudulently concealed was, that they knew that the mineral which they had been working in Boghead was of unusually good quality and great value, and that they had reason to believe that the same mineral might be found in Torbanehill. But what in the present action they are accused of having fraudulently concealed is, not that they had such a mere speculative belief that this valuable mineral might be found in Torbanehill, but that they had certain knowledge that it actually did exist, and might be wrought in these lands.

And the fraudulent misrepresentation of which the defenders were accused in the former action, was said to have consisted in their asserting to the pursuer that the quality and the value of the mineral which was so found in Boghead, and believed to be in Torbanehill, were less than the defenders knew them to be. But the fraudulent misrepresentation of which they are accused in the present action is said to have consisted in their having asserted that, de facto, no such mineral exists in Torbanehill, although they were in actual knowledge of its existence there.

The things alleged to have been concealed and misrepresented in the two actions being thus so very different, a judgment as to the relevancy of the one set of accusations is not res judicata as to the relevancy of the other; and the question as to the relevancy of the accusations in the present action must be dealt with on its own merits.

The question thus raised appears to me to be a very large and difficult one in the law of mutual contracts; and, as we were told from the bar, it has never yet been authoritatively decided. It involves the important inquiry,—how far the law entitles a party, in contracting with another, in circumstances such as those in which the lease under challenge was granted, to rely upon the statements made by that opposite party, without making inquiry as to their truth? If we are to determine this question at this stage of the proceedings, I would require further argument upon it from the bar. But I think that the Court, in the exercise of its discretion, should have the facts of the case ascertained, before entering upon the discussion of such a large and important question of law; because it may eventually be found that the question of law, in the aspect in which it now presents itself in the record, does not arise in the actual facts of the case, and may never require to be determined in this action, and that the actual facts may give rise to quite a different question of law. I therefore entirely concur in the proposal to recal in hoc statu the Lord Ordinary's finding as to relevancy, and to have the case tried by jury, without at present deciding any question of law.

LORD DEAS.—There are two questions decided by the Lord Ordinary,—the question of res judicata and the question of relevancy. It was argued for the pursuers that if the one action be relevant and the other not, this of itself was a sufficient difference to prevent the applicability of the plea of res judicata. I do not think any of your Lordships adopt this part of the argument, and I certainly cannot concur in it. We must go further, and inquire whether the nature and grounds of the two actions be or be not the same; and it is upon the result of this inquiry that the applicability of the plea of res judicata must depend.

Now, in inquiring into the nature and grounds of the two actions, I look, in the first instance, at the summonses, including, of course, under that name the condescendences annexed thereto; and, from these, I find that both actions are actions of reduction of the lease in dispute, having petitory conclusions consequent upon success in the reduction,—with this distinction only, that, whereas the first action was directed to reduction of the lease in toto, or, alternatively, to its reduction quoad the particular substance in dispute, the second action omits this last alterna-

No. 197.
 June 26, 1857.
 Gillespie v.
 Russel.

tive, and is directed solely to a total reduction of the lease,—a distinction which plainly can make no difference as regards the present question. The alternative conclusion for partial reduction seems to me to have been introduced into the original summons, because the alleged fraudulent misrepresentation and concealment related solely to the particular substance alluded to, and one of the views intended to be covered by the summons seems to have been that, if the lease were reduced quoad this substance, it might, in consequence, be held void quoad ultra, on the ground of error in essentialibus, which last plea has been dropt out of the present action, as not being deemed necessary to the attainment of the object in view. But I cannot doubt that under the original summons, if otherwise unobjectionable, it would have been quite competent to have set aside the lease in toto; and to have demanded a general accounting under the conclusions which were, I doubt not, purposely introduced, requiring a state of accounts “in relation to the premises,” in contradistinction to the first petitory conclusion, which was limited to the value of this particular substance. Accordingly, no objection was pleaded to the effect, nor was it made the ground of judgment, that the action was limited to a remedy which could not be given,—namely, partial reduction of the lease.

Both actions, therefore, must be regarded as actions of reduction of the lease. Such being their nature, I proceed next to inquire into the grounds upon which the actions respectively proceeded.

Now the ground of action in both cases, admittedly, was fraud. I do not say that this would be enough, because the frauds might be different. But it appears to me that the fraud averred in both cases,—I am still speaking with reference to the summonses and relative condescendences,—consisted in this, that the defenders knew of the existence in large quantity, in the lands of Torbanehill, of the same sort of valuable mineral (meaning coal of a particular description) they were working in Boghead,—that they concealed this from the pursuers, who were ignorant of it, and falsely represented to the pursuers, and led them to believe, that there was no such valuable mineral in Torbanehill, and that the only coal to be found there was of inferior quality, and, by this fraudulent concealment and fraudulent misrepresentation, induced the pursuers to enter into the lease. If this be a correct view of the import of the summonses, it seems clear enough that the nature of the fraud set forth in both cases was the same, and that the grounds of action are consequently the same.

That I have rightly stated the nature of the fraud averred in the present summons and record will not be disputed. That I have rightly stated the nature of the fraud averred in the original summons will, I think, be apparent on attending, in particular, to article 4 of the original condescendence, in connection with articles 9, 16, and subsequent articles of the same paper. After stating the nature and qualities of the mineral substance, as ascertained by the defenders, found by them in Boghead, the pursuers set forth in article 4 of their original condescendence:—“The defenders, when they opened their communication with the pursuers for a lease of the minerals in Torbanehill, as above mentioned, were well aware that the said valuable mineral substance which they had found in Boghead, and which they were then selling under the name of Boghead or Bathgate gas-coal, was to be found, in large quantity, in the lands of Torbanehill.” The subsequent articles which it is unnecessary to quote, set forth the pursuers’ ignorance and the defenders’ concealment and misrepresentation of what the defenders are thus said to have been well aware of,—namely, the valuable qualities of the mineral substance and its existence in Torbanehill.

In the condescendence annexed to the present summons, art. 3, 4, and 5, the pursuers set forth that the defenders “had by enquiry, experiment, skilful analysis,” (it is not said of what) “and otherwise, satisfied themselves and become perfectly aware” of the existence, in Torbanehill, of the mineral substance in question, and had ascertained its valuable qualities. Between the import of these three articles and the import of art. 4 (in connection with the preceding articles) of the original condescendence, there is plainly no substantial difference. In the first condescendence it is said the defenders “were well aware,” and, in the second, that they had “become perfectly aware,” (by means somewhat ambiguously stated) of the existence, in Torbanehill, of the same valuable mineral which they had found in Boghead. It is true that in their revised condescendence, in the present action, the pursuers, in addition to saying that the defenders had "become perfectly aware," introduce the words "and they knew." But the allegation that the defenders knew is in no respect substantially different from the statement that they were perfectly aware; and, indeed, if the pursuers had thought them substantially different, they would not, I presume, have rested, as they do, upon the words "perfectly aware" in the condescendence which forms part of their present summons. Moreover, if both summonses are, in this respect, as I think they are, substantially the same, it is obvious that the words "they knew" might equally have been introduced, on revisal, in the one record as in the other. The point I draw attention to at present, however, is that, in so far as regards the defenders' knowledge,—without which the allegations of concealment and misrepresentation, set forth in both cases, would want their foundation,—the condescendences, which formed part of the original summonses, are not only substantially but almost identically the same, and that even the revised condescendence, in the present action, is, in this respect, substantially the same with the original condescendence in both actions. Laying, then, out of view any variation of phraseology (which I shall immediately notice) introduced into the revised condescendence in the first action, we have both actions describing the fraud whereby the lease was obtained, as consisting in the same sort of knowledge, coupled with concealment and misrepresentation of what was so known; and if this be not, in both cases, the same ground of action, I must confess myself unable to understand what the same ground of action is.

No. 197.

—
June 26, 1857.
Gillespie v.
Russel.

If, then, the matter would have stood thus but for the variation introduced on revisal into the 4th article of the condescendence in the original action, by saying that the defenders "were well aware, or had sufficient grounds for believing," in place of simply saying they "were well aware," I cannot hold that this variation, by the pursuers, of the words of their averment, will prevent the grounds of action, in the two cases, from being the same. In place of this variation the pursuers might, just as competently, have introduced the words "they knew," into their revised condescendence in the first action as into their revised condescendence in the second action; and they might, in like manner, have quite competently explained, if they had thought proper, in the revised condescendence in either case, the nature of the knowledge, or the means of knowledge, or anything else they thought necessary to make their meaning and the nature of the concealment and misrepresentation relied on by them clear. Parties who come into Court with an action calculated to try their cause are not entitled to harass their opponent with new actions (which might be endless) by frittering away their averments, upon revisal, which, in so far as it may have been done here, can only be accounted for, in the absence of any allegation of res noviter, by supposing that the pursuers had become satisfied that their modified averments were all they could expect to prove. If the modification was material, and happened by accident or mistake, and not by design, the pursuers' remedy was to have abandoned their action, which they might have done, even upon a closed record, under section 10 of the Judicature Act, so long as there was no judgment against them. But, after a record is closed, I pray your Lordships to observe that it is only when it appears that the parties have respectively admitted on record all the facts requisite for decision, so as to render a trial unnecessary, that your Lordships are authorised, by sect. 13 of the Judicature Act, to decide without probation; and that, when a case is decided against a pursuer upon relevancy, it is upon the footing of the facts averred by him being held to be all proved, and, consequently, the decision is a decision upon the merits, altogether different in its effects from a decision under sect. 6 of the statute, by which the Lord Ordinary is directed, after the dilatory defences are disposed of, to examine into the correctness of the summons and peremptory defences, and if it shall appear that the grounds of action, as set forth in the summons, are in terms not sufficiently positive and clear, or the conclusion not regularly or legally deduced, then, either to dismiss the action with expenses, reserving to the pursuer to bring a new action, or to order an amendment and decern ad interim for the expenses thereby occasioned. The judgment, in the first action, did not proceed under this latter enactment, but was pronounced upon a closed record, in which, it must be assumed, the pursuers had stated all the facts they knew in support of their ground of action, just as it must have been assumed,

No. 197. had they been allowed to go to trial, under that record, that they had proved all the facts relied on by them, in so far as these were capable of being proved. It is of little moment whether the facts are proved, or held and assumed to have been proved. The merits of the cause, on which the pursuer joins issue with his opponent, are, in either case, decided; and, in this point of view, I am not prepared to say that the plea of res judicata would not have been applicable, although, in the condescendence which formed part of the first summons, the words "were well aware" had been coupled, as they were on revisal, with the words "or had sufficient grounds for believing." Or, vice versa, although these last mentioned words had not been in the revised condescendence any more than in the summons in that first action. The grounds of action in both suits, would still, I think, have been substantially the same. The only effect of adding the words "or had sufficient grounds for believing" was to make it somewhat more obvious, than it otherwise might have been, that the action was calculated and intended to cover a case of knowledge as matter of belief resting upon inference and skill, and was not directed and limited to a case of knowledge as matter of ascertained fact. But this I think would have been clear enough, as regarded the original action, although the words "or had sufficient grounds for believing" had not been introduced on revisal, and is clear enough as regards the present action although these words are not used in it. I shall immediately have occasion to state the grounds on which I think the words "they knew," in the present record, do not necessarily or even naturally, any more than the words "were well aware" in the original record, mean that the defenders knew as matter of ascertained fact. But if the words "they knew" did and do import something more than was imported by the words "were well aware, or had sufficient grounds for believing," then it was incumbent on the pursuers, in their original action, to have used the words "they knew," or some equivalent words. They do not pretend to have ascertained that the defenders "knew" since the record was closed in the first action. They do not rest their right to bring a second action, to any extent, on the plea res noviter veniens ad notitiam. And this being so, the fact that they might, quite competently, have used, in the first record, the same words which they have used in the second, is of itself sufficient to exclude the present action. It is no answer to say that until judgment was delivered in the first action the pursuers supposed their case to be relevantly and sufficiently averred. If the pursuers have mistaken the law in this respect they must take the consequences. In this sense, and to this effect, the plea of competent and omitted (as was stated in the argument) is undoubtedly applicable to a pursuer as well as to a defender. But, although this view would, of itself, be sufficient, it is not necessary to rest upon it. For here the plea of the defenders is much stronger than the plea of competent and omitted. It is a plea to the effect that the very thing now relied on was, in the first action, competent,—pleaded,—and departed from. On these grounds, in connection with some further explanations which will appear when I come to speak of the relevancy of the present action, I am humbly of opinion that the plea of res judicata ought to be sustained.

As regards the relevancy, my opinion is adverse to the pursuers in the present action, as it was in the former action. The substance of the view I take upon this point may be stated without much detail. If the pursuers had distinctly and unequivocally averred knowledge, peculiar to the defenders, as matter of ascertained fact, of the existence, in considerable quantity, in the lands of Torbanehill of the mineral substance in dispute:—for instance, if they had averred that the defenders had ascertained this by secret workings through the march, from the adjoining lands of Boghead, and analysing the substance found in Torbanehill. I am not prepared to say that concealment and misrepresentation of the facts thus ascertained might not have been relevant to void the lease. Nor do I say what might have been the effect of misrepresentation as well as concealment of what had been actually found in workings along the Boghead side of the Torbanehill march. Upon such questions, till they arise, it is unnecessary to form an opinion. On the other hand, assuming the knowledge averred of the minerals in Torbanehill to be merely that sort of knowledge which rests upon inference and skill, from acquaintance with the general strata in that part of the country, and finding the disputed mineral in some part (it is not said what part) of the adjoining estate, I have no difficulty in holding that concealment and misrepresentation in regard to expectations thus formed would not be of themselves sufficient to void the lease. Now, what I desiderate in this record is the use of language which should make it clear that the alleged knowledge, on the part of the defenders, of the Torbanehill minerals was of the first of these kinds, and not of the second. The expression, "they knew" is ambiguous. These words are familiarly used in many different senses. We are said to know many things in geology, geography, and so on, which are more properly only matters of belief. Now, in cases of fraud, the rule of pleading is, that it must be distinctly set forth in what the alleged fraud consists, so as to satisfy the Court, before they send the case to a jury, that, if the averments be true, they really amount to fraud. In order to do this the words used to explain in what the fraud consists must not, themselves, be ambiguous. Here I think they are so. For to say that the defenders knew that the mineral substance in dispute existed, in great abundance, in Torbanehill would be correct enough language to use, although it was intended to prove no other knowledge on their part than the knowledge possessed by any skilful mining engineer, acquainted with the strata in the district, who, from finding a mineral in one estate, infers that it will be found in another. I see nothing set forth in this record incompatible with the pursuers, if the case goes to a jury, asking a verdict in their favour, although they prove no other knowledge than such knowledge as I have just mentioned. If they meant knowledge as matter of ascertained fact, it was easy to have said so. I see no reason to think they did mean it. At all events they have not said it in the unequivocal language necessary to give to the averment the only meaning in which it could legally form the foundation of a charge of fraud to void the lease.

June 26, 1857.
Gillespie v.
Russel.

No. 197.

June 26, 1857.

Gillespie v.
Russel.

On the contrary, the whole concomitant language points at a kind of knowledge derived merely from skill and inference equally open to the pursuers and others as to the defenders. The leading averment, in connection with which all that follows must be read, is to be found in the commencement of article 3d of the revised condescendence, which bears that the defenders had, by careful investigation, made themselves aware of the nature of the mineral strata in the district, and, in particular, of the nature, quality, and extent of the minerals in Torbanehill. This is, obviously, an averment that the minerals in Torbanehill were known to the defenders in the same way with the strata in the district; and, indeed, their extent could only have been known in that way. Then follows the averment that "they had by enquiry, experiment, skilful analysis, and otherwise, satisfied themselves, and they knew and had become perfectly aware, that there existed in these lands of Torbanehill a gas coal" of the kind mentioned in article 2d as forming a stratum in both estates. If the pursuers had here meant that the gas coal analysed was gas coal found in Torbanehill, they would of course have said so. The fact would have been far too important for them (especially looking to the fate of their first action) not to have been distinctly stated. But there is no statement of the kind throughout this record. The pursuers go on to say, in article 4th, that the defenders had found the stratum of this gas coal in Boghead, and "they knew, as already mentioned, that it was in the lands of Torbanehill,"—that is to say, they knew, by careful investigation of the strata in the district, and by experiment, analysis, &c., as mentioned in article 3d. In like manner, the natural meaning of the words "they knew," and "had satisfactorily ascertained," in articles 5th and 9th, where alone they again occur, is that they knew and had ascertained in the way set forth in the previous articles; and, indeed, this appears clearly enough to be the meaning, from the statement in article 5th, that they knew not only the quality and value of the coal, but also that it was to be found of such quality and value in the pursuer's lands in great abundance—a matter which, unless the defenders had bored or penetrated into the pursuer's lands (which is nowhere alleged) could not possibly have been known to them except by inference, any more than what immediately follows, that it "could be wrought and turned out to immense advantage and profit." The language of art. 9 is precisely similar to that of art. 5, and the same remarks apply to it.

The only averment that the defenders' knowledge, such as it was, was peculiar or exclusive, is that contained in the concluding words of art. 4 :—"But the existence of the mineral in question in Torbanehill and Boghead, and its character and qualities, were unknown except to the defenders." Now, shutting ones eyes to the averments in the first record about the Boghead mineral and its value being publicly

No. 197. known in the market, and taking this averment literally as it stands, it is obvious to remark that if the knowledge averred to have been possessed by the defenders of the Torbanehill minerals, be (as I think it is) merely knowledge derived from investigation into the nature of the strata in the district, inclusive of Boghead, this was knowledge, so far as regarded the general strata, equally accessible to the pursuers as to the defenders, and knowledge, so far as regarded Boghead, which the defenders were not bound to communicate to the pursuers. What might have been the effect of a denial that the mineral substance had been found, or existed in Boghead, or of misrepresentation as to the qualities and value of the minerals actually found there, it is needless to inquire; for nothing of this kind is alleged. The misrepresentation averred and relied on relates exclusively and throughout to the minerals in Torbanehill. But this allusion to "the existence" of the mineral in the lands leads me to remark, that while, for brevity, I have occasionally spoken, as the pursuers do, of the "mineral" or "mineral substance" in dispute, I do not lose sight of the fact, the importance of which I had occasion to point out in the opinion I delivered in the former action, that this question has arisen, not from any different species of mineral from what had been let being found in the lands, but from a portion of that mineral—that is to say, a portion of the coal—being found to possess higher qualities, and to be greatly more valuable than the pursuers had anticipated. The existence, in the lands, of coal which might be wrought to profit, was admittedly known to both parties, and the coal accordingly was the subject let, and the only subject let. It is fixed by the verdict of a jury that the substance in dispute is coal; and the fraud averred and relied on, equally in both actions, consequently, consisted, and could only have consisted, in concealment and misrepresentation of the qualities and value of a portion or portions of this coal. Concealment of the existence of the mineral let,—namely coal,—and false representations to the effect that it did not exist in the lands, are not, and could not have been the foundation of either action. Concealment and false representations as to the qualities and value of large portions of the mineral let,—that is to say, of large portions of the coal in Torbanehill,—are equally the foundation of both actions;—an observation the importance of which, both as bearing on the plea of res judicata, and on the present question of relevancy, is too obvious to require illustration.

When the pursuers say, somewhat loosely, in the passage just quoted from art. 4, that the existence of the mineral in question in Torbanehill and Boghead, and its character and qualities, were unknown except to the defenders, they obviously do not mean, and could not possibly mean, that the existence of coal in the lands was unknown except to the defenders. They merely mean that the qualities and value of those portions of the coal which, even now, they are reluctant to speak of otherwise than as a different mineral, were unknown except to the defenders. Depreciation by the purchaser (for the lessee of coal is virtually a purchaser) of the qualities and value of the article purchased, is thus equally at the root of both actions. In both the depreciation is no doubt said to have gone the length of fraudulent misrepresentation as well as concealment. But these general words will not sustain this action, unless sufficiently explained, and something stated which can be said to warrant the sellers in trusting for their information, as to the value and qualities of their own coal, to the purchaser's representations, in place of ascertaining these for themselves, which it is not said there was anything here to prevent them from having done.

I have only to add that, while I adhere to the views I expressed the other day upon the inexpediency of deciding, in the ordinary run of cases, nice questions of law and relevancy before the facts are ascertained, I think a great distinction is to be made in regard to cases of fraud. For upon the same principle on which we require, in this last description of cases, a very different specification of facts from what we do in ordinary cases, we have also been in the habit of requiring that the relevancy of these facts shall be clear before a charge so gravely affecting character shall go to a jury; and I see no sufficient grounds for following a different course, in this case, from that which we have usually followed in cases of fraud.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Adhere to the interlocutor reclaimed against, in so far as it repels the plea of res judicata ; but as regards the finding upon relevancy, in respect that in this stage it is not necessary, and in the circumstances of the case it is not expedient that any question of relevancy should be determined or disposed of before going to trial, Recall the said finding in hoc statu ; and with this variation, remit the cause to the Lord Ordinary, that the same may be proceeded in as accords of law, in order to trial : Find the defenders liable to the pursuers in the expenses of process incurred by the pursuers since the date of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor reclaimed against, and remit," &c.

No. 197.

June 26, 1857.
Mathieson.

D. M. & H. BLACK, W.S.—JAMES BURN, W.S.—Agents.

JOHN ANDERSON MATHIESON, Petitioner.—A. B. Shand.

No. 198.

Judicial Factor—Curator Bonis—Special Powers—Procedure where necessary to realise moveable estate in England of a lunatic, and invest the proceeds in heritable security in Scotland.—The Lords Justices in England having refused to direct transfers by a curator bonis of shares of the stock of an English company belonging to his ward, in part in respect there was no suggestion from the Scotch courts as to realising the shares, the Court, on the application of the curator, "authorised" him to take all necessary steps for selling and transferring the shares, and investing the proceeds in heritable security in Scotland.

THE petitioner, John Anderson Mathieson, was curator bonis to John Astley Anderson, a lunatic, who, in June 1850, previous to his insanity, had acquired nine shares of the stock of the Birmingham Canal Navigation Company. These the petitioner sold on the suggestion of the Accountant of Court. He received payment of the price in February 1856, but the Company refused to register the transfers, on the ground that the petitioner had not been specially empowered by the Court to sell the shares. In these circumstances, the petitioner was obliged to refund the price of the shares to the purchaser, which still stand registered in the lunatic's name.

June 26, 1857.
1ST DIVISION.
C.

The statute 16 & 17 Victoria, cap. 70, provides for the transference of shares to the name of a curator in circumstances similar to those of this case, and provides that the curator (or other party wishing the transfer of the stock), shall lay before the Master in Lunacy in England a statement of facts shewing the whole circumstances of the lunacy, the appointment of the curator, and the nature of the stock proposed to be dealt with. That upon this the Master makes a report, which report is confirmed by petition presented formerly to the Lord Chancellor, now to the Lords Justices, who, by a subsequent Act, are empowered to act in lunacy for the Lord Chancellor.

The petitioner stated, that he had laid the necessary statement before the Master in Lunacy, and that it was in usual form submitted to the Lords Justices, who, after considering it, stated, that they did not "see sufficient cause" for directing a transfer of the shares, which accordingly they did not consent to, giving as their reason that there had been "no suggestion in this case from the Court of Session for realising the shares." That, in these circumstances, on a recommendation by the Accountant of Court, the curator presented the present petition, praying the Court, after intimation in ordinary form, to direct and authorise the petitioner, or at least to direct the petitioner, to effect and conclude the sale, transfer, and registration of the said shares, and to take all necessary steps in England for that purpose, and thereafter to invest the proceeds of said shares upon good heritable security in this country," &c.

The Lord Ordinary, to whom the case had been remitted, expressed himself favourable to the expediency of selling the shares ; but suggested that, as a "direction" to sell might interfere with the discretion of the curator, the Court should grant "authority" to do so.

No. 198.

June 26, 1857.
Provost and Magistrates
of Dundee v.
Morris.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—" Authorise the petitioner to take all steps necessary for selling and transferring the nine shares of the stock of the Birmingham Canal Navigation Company, mentioned in the petition, and for realising the proceeds of the said shares, and investing these proceeds on heritable security in Scotland, as prayed for in the petition, and decern."

JAMES SOMEVILLE, S.S.C.—Agent.

No. 199. THE PROVOST AND MAGISTRATES OF DUNDEE AND OTHERS, Pursuers.—
Patton—Thoms.

JOHN MORRIS AND OTHERS, Defenders.—D. F. Inglis—Penney.

Testament—Legacy—Vitiation.—In a holograph writing containing no words of conveyance, a party said, "I wish to establish in the town of Dundee an hospital" on the plan of Heriot's Hospital. The word "hospital," and the direction following, were deleted. A subsequent holograph writing said, "I wish 100 boys to be admitted in the hospital at Dundee." A third writing, neither holograph nor tested, contained directions as to the management of the hospital;—Held, that the Court could not replace the word "hospital," which had been deleted by the testator, and that no valid legacy for the endowment of an hospital had been constituted.

Question, Whether the mere expression of a wish to found an hospital would suffice to oblige the next of kin taking as ab intestato to erect an hospital.

June 26, 1857. SEE ante, p. 168.

2D DIVISION.
Ld Handyside.
I.

This action, raised by the Provost and Magistrates, and the Nine Incorporated Trades of Dundee, against Mr Lindsay, the judicial factor on the estate of the late Mr Morgan, to whom he was also decerned executor-dative; and the parties who had made out their claim to be next of kin, after protracted litigation—(see ante, vol. xvi. p. 82; vol. xviii. House of Lords report, p. 46; Court of Session, p. 798 and 817)—came into the Inner-House on a reclaiming note against a judgment of the Lord Ordinary repelling preliminary pleas, which judgment was adhered to on 14th December 1856. A record was then made up as between the pursuers and the next of kin, and the case now came before the Court for judgment on the merits.

The pursuers concluded for declarator, that the testamentary writings left by Mr Morgan contained a valid legacy and bequest of the whole of the residue of his moveable means and estate, after paying legacies, &c., or at least of so much thereof as might be necessary for the purpose of erecting and establishing, in the town of Dundee, an hospital to accommodate 100 boys, and that the same were valid and effectual as testamentary deeds of the deceased to that effect: And to have it further found and declared, that the succession of the deceased was burdened with the said bequest, and that the defender, the said Donald Lindsay, as executor, or the parties who might be found entitled to succeed to the deceased's moveable estate, were bound to hold and retain the residue, or at least so much thereof as might be necessary for the purpose of erecting and establishing, in the town of Dundee, an hospital to accommodate 100 boys, in fulfilment of the testamentary bequest, subject to the orders of the Court, in order to its application for the purpose of founding an hospital; or otherwise were bound to pay over the same to the pursuers, or to such persons as might be appointed for the purpose of superintending the erection and establishment of the said hospital, or for carrying such testamentary purpose into effect: And that the defenders should be decerned to pay to the pursuers, in order to the same being applied by them to the erection and establishment of an hospital, or to such persons as might be appointed therefor, the sum of L.100,000 sterling, or such other sum as should be fixed as the amount of the residue of the moveable means and estate of the said John Morgan, or as the amount necessary for erecting and establishing in the town of Dundee an hospital to accommodate 100 boys: And that a scheme for the application and disposal of the funds bequeathed as aforesaid, should be prepared, in order that a scheme might be made and fixed for the application and disposal of the said funds.

No. 199.

—
June 28, 1857.
Provost and Magistrates
of Dundee v.
Morris.

Mr Morgan left ten holograph testamentary writings. Three, of various dates prior to 10th October 1842, conferred a liferent of his whole estate on his sister, and contained apparently other provisions, but were so much deleted as to be to some extent illegible. They were written on two leaves, which appeared at one time to have formed a single sheet; both sides of one leaf, and one side of the other were written upon. The subscriptions to these writings were scored, and they were revoked by a fourth writing in the following terms:—"Edinburgh, 10th October 1842.—I hereby annual all hitherto written on the first, second, and third pages of this, and wish to establish in the town of Dundee, in the shire of Forfar, an [an hospital strictly in size, the management of the interior of said hospital in every way as Heriot's Hospital in Edinburgh is conducted],* the inhabitants born and educated in Dundee to have the preference of the towns of Forfar, Arbroath, and Montrose, but inhabitants of any other county or town are excluded. JNO. MORGAN." The fifth writing conferred a liferent on Miss Morgan, but was cancelled. The sixth was as follows:—"I hereby wish only one hundred boys to be admitted in the hospital at Dundee, [and the structure of the house to be less than that of Heriot's Hospital],* and to contain one hundred boys in place of one hundred and eighty boys. JNO. MORGAN. Edinburgh, 20th October 1842."

The seventh, eighth, ninth, and tenth writings were of various dates between 23d October 1842 and 25th August 1846. They contained bequests of legacies, and other matters, but made no reference to the hospital. The whole of these ten writings were holograph of Mr Morgan, and that dated 10th October 1842, and those of subsequent dates, were written on the same leaf of paper.

Another writing, which was produced, dated 6th September 1846, was on a separate paper, and in the handwriting of Miss Morgan. By it Mr Morgan bequeathed to her the liferent of all his property. It contained the following clause:—"I beg and request the Honourable Court of Session to nominate a judicial factor for the management of my property, whether real or personal; that is, by laying it out to the best advantage after my death, and my sister Agnes Morgan, to accumulate for ten years, to erect an hospital in Dundee to educate the poor children of the nine trades—the name of Morgan to be preferred, although they do not belong to Dundee. I wish that the hospital may not be very expensive, as it is for poor children. The judicial factor is not to take place until the death of my sister Agnes Morgan. If my sister's death was to take place before mine, I wish at my death my house in 17 Coates Crescent and furniture to be sold, likewise my house and grounds in Calcutta, the money to go to the fund for the hospital in Dundee to educate the poor children of the nine trades of Dundee—the name of Morgan be preferred." This writing contained also bequests of legacies to servants and various other parties, and was dated and signed by Mr Morgan, but was not tested. The pursuers however alleged, what was not admitted, that the following words which occurred in it were also holograph of Morgan, "the legacy duty to be paid for my servants;" and it was stated that the legacies to some of the deceased's friends and servants had been paid.

The defenders stated the following as their second and third pleas:—
(2d.) The writing of 6th September 1846 not being holograph of John

* The words printed in italics within brackets [], though still legible, had been scored out.

No. 199. Morgan, and not being tested, was invalid; and the writings of 10th and 20th October 1842 were not valid or effectual as testamentary instruments. (3d.) The writings libelled did not constitute or contain an effectual legacy or bequest; and, at all events, they did not constitute or contain the alleged legacy or bequest of the whole or of any part of Mr Morgan's funds for the erection and establishment of an hospital in the town of Dundee, and none for the erection and establishment there of an hospital to accommodate 100 boys.

June 26, 1857.
Provost and Magistrates of Dundee v.
Morris.

These pleas were sustained by the Lord Ordinary in the following interlocutor:—"Sustains the second and third pleas in law for the defenders: Assolziez them from the conclusions of the action, and decerns: Finds the pursuers liable in expenses, allows an account," &c. *

* "NOTE.—This case is of importance from the magnitude of the succession which is at stake, the whole of which, saving trifling legacies, is claimed by the pursuers, to satisfy the purpose of a charitable bequest pleaded to have been made by the deceased. The case was elaborately argued on the part of the pursuers, with a copious reference to cases, particularly in the English Courts. The Lord Ordinary has given full consideration to all that was urged in support of the claim, but he has been unable to discover any satisfactory legal ground on which he could recognise the writings founded on as containing a sufficient expression of the deceased's will, entitled to have effect given to them as a will, and this independently of objections to the contents of the writings as incapable of being acted on by reason of uncertainty and indefiniteness in the objects supposed to have been contemplated.

"Referring to the lithographed fac simile of the writings found in the repositories of the deceased or of his sister, who lived in family with him, both having departed this life within a short period of each other, and Mr Morgan being under curatory previous to his sister's death, it is to be observed that the first of these writings, dated in January 1836, which may possibly have contained a disposition or settlement of his estate, is not only so obliterated in all material passages which may have given it that character, so as to prevent its being referred to and used as the expression of purpose and will at the period of its execution, but this writing, with the memorandum attached, is expressly annulled by the writing of 10th October 1842. It is plain, therefore, that any writing preceding that last date must be cast aside altogether, and only it and those of subsequent dates are to be taken as expressive of the last will of the deceased. Then, as to the writing of 6th September 1846—the latest of all those found—as it is not holograph of the deceased, and is otherwise improbativ, it cannot be available by reason of improbativeness, if the deceased have not by previous writings attempted to provide for its authenticity being supplied and ascertained by some marks fixed upon by himself, and which law would, with whatever difficulty, recognise as sufficient to obviate the general objection of improbativeness. But there is no special provision in the earlier writings to dispense, as regards this last one, with the recognised rule of law. The only writings, then, which can be put forward as being of a testamentary character are those holograph of the deceased, and bearing his signature unobliterated, of date 10th October 1842 and subsequent dates. Those founded on by the pursuers as constituting the bequest, which they seek in the summons to be declared in their favour, are the writings of 10th and 20th October 1842. The question is, whether singly or together they constitute a valid bequest containing a sufficient expression of the deceased's will to be entitled to receive effect.

"The writing of 10th October is first to be considered. It became the leading testamentary writing of the deceased, for it annuls all previously written by him on previous pages. Now, it is to be observed that this writing contains no words of conveyance or bequest either of the universitas of the estate, or of any portion thereof, or of any particular sum of money; nor is there any appointment of executors or of trustees, or a nomination of a legatee or beneficiary. The only thing is, after annulling all hitherto written on the preceding pages of the paper, the expression of—'I wish to establish in the town of Dundee,' &c. How this wish is to be carried out, who are to do so, what fund is to be appropriated for it.—none of these things are to be provided for, or mentioned. The whole of the

The pursuers reclaimed, and pleaded; — That Mr Morgan's holograph No. 199. writings were testamentary: because the circumstances connected with them

June 26, 1857.

Provost and Magistrates of Dundee v. Morris.

writer's expression of his will or desire is contained in the words—'I wish to establish.' Throwing aside any consideration of the effect to be allowed to the word 'establish'—a subject which falls under the objection of uncertainty raised against the terms of the bequest—the sufficiency of the word 'wish,' as expressing a bequest in terms apt and sufficient, is to be determined. Had there been a conveyance in trust by the deceased of his estate, it is conceived there could be no doubt that such an expression of wish as to an object would have been tantamount to express words of bequest or direction. Crichton v. Grierson, July 1828, 3 W. and S. 331. Or if there had been a nomination of executors to take and administer the estate, such words would have been efficacious. Even if there were an omission to name executors, yet the next of kin confirming would have been bound to give effect to a legacy as sufficiently constituted under such an expression of desire in the deceased's will.—See per Lord Fullerton, in Dundas v. Dundas, January 27, 1837. The peculiarity, and thence the difficulty perhaps, in this case is, that there is a bare wish, unconnected with any words of disposal or appropriation of the estate of the writer, and that the accomplishment of the wish is to be inferred as having been intended to be fulfilled by appropriation out of the estate of what was necessary to attain the end. There is probably difficulty in thus applying the words which it may be supposed were in the writer's mind—namely, 'with my whole estate,' or 'with what is requisite from my estate for the purpose'—so as to give perfect intelligibility to the wish as it is expressed. Still the Lord Ordinary is not prepared to hold that the word 'wish' is in itself, and by the want of other words, so feeble and defective, that it is not entitled to be taken as an expression of will, and introductory to a bequest, if that otherwise be sufficiently explicit.—See Report by Lord Stair of Nasmyth v. Jaffray, July 25, 1662; Mor. p. 5483.

"It is on reaching the next step in this writing that the fatal defect in it appears. It does not bear what it is that the writer wished to establish in the town of Dundee. The writing must be taken and read with the deletions appearing on its face when found. It wants then the essential word, indeed sentence, to make it intelligible and effective. It is a perfect blank as to what is to be established. Without the deleted sentence, the later and concluding one, which remains unobliterated, has no meaning whatever—it depends wholly on the expunged sentence for intelligible application. The Lord Ordinary is unable to see any mode by which this writing can be set up as an expression of will. It appears to him that it must be wholly discarded and laid aside as being in essentialibus imperfect.

"The pursuers represented the deletion as being intentional only as regarded the sentence following 'hospital,' and suggested that the word 'hospital' had been deleted per incuriam. The Lord Ordinary cannot countenance such a suggestion as fitted for legal consideration. For the Court to reinstate the word which the deceased had struck out—which they would be doing by holding it to have been unintentionally deleted, of which there can be no evidence—would be wholly unwarrantable, and involve a stretch of power, under the guise of drawing inferences of the writer's mind and intention, contrary to the apparent fact shewn by an act which speaks to the eye itself.

"The Lord Ordinary thinks that the writing of 10th October must be taken exactly as it stands; and so the only operative part of it was annulling previous writings on the same sheet of paper, but which become of no moment, as the only unobliterated parts of such writings had reference to a life interest to his sister in his estate, but which was evacuated by her predeceasing him.

"The second writing, of 20th October, is now to be considered. The pursuers contend they are entitled to make use of it to supply the defect in the former writing by the deletion of the word 'hospital,' and taking both writings together they argued that thereby the will of Mr Morgan is sufficiently demonstrated, and his intention explained, so as to entitle the pursuers to have declarator pronounced as concluded for.

"This second writing does undoubtedly imply the execution and existence of a former writing by which Mr Morgan had made some provision, or declaration, or expressed some wish, regarding an hospital in Dundee, which he describes as 'the

No. 199. entitled them to be considered such;¹—they bore to be so.—They dealt with his “property” “at” and “after my death,” and were declared to be “my settlement.” If there could be doubt as to this, reference was made to the first writing, for which those of 10th October 1842 and posterior dates were substituted. The use of the word “annul” did not exclude this reference.² Then, if these writings were to be considered testamentary, there was a valid expression of wish to establish an hospital in Dundee for 100 boys. These writings were to be construed as if forming one settlement. Writings such as Mr Morgan left were always so construed.³ The writings of 10th and 20th October 1842, taken together, contained an expression of intention which the Court must recognise. What effect was to be given to that expression was not now in question. The pursuers in this argument assumed it would be effectual. The expression of wish to establish an hospital did exist; although there was to be a hiatus in the place of the word “hospital” deleted in the writing of 10th October—the sense supplied it.⁴ There was enough to give rise to a presumption as to intention, and the presumed will of the testator must be given effect to.⁵ The word “hospital” could not, however, be treated as a blank. It existed, and the Court were entitled to read it. This was the distinction between erasures

June 28, 1857.
Provost and Magistrates of Dundee v.
Morris.

hospital at Dundee,’ and to which he had wished to be admitted 180 boys; and the change which he makes is by now expressing his wish that only 100 boys be admitted into the hospital, and that it should contain 100 in place of 180. But where is this previous writing to be found? The former writing is a blank as to hospital, and equally a blank as to boys. Unless the deleted sentence, which is not so obliterated but its words may still be read, is by that circumstance to be reared up so as to be read, and what has legally become a blank by deletion is notwithstanding to be treated as something which may notwithstanding be judicially read, it is plain that the second writing expresses a wish to alter or change something which has gone before, but evidence of which is legally non-existent. The second writing, standing alone, is insufficient in its terms to form a bequest, and the contrary was not attempted to be maintained. It is dependent on the existence of a former valid writing constituting a bequest, and which is to be altered in one respect by this second writing. But if there be no former writing in regard to an hospital at Dundee, and to which reference is explicitly made by mentioning ‘the hospital at Dundee,’ the later writing becomes nugatory.

“The Lord Ordinary conceives there is insuperable difficulty in connecting the one writing with the other. Reading the first, as according to the rules of law it must be read, by holding the part deleted as pro non scripto, it is radically defective, and so must be denied legal effect. Reading the second as referring to a prior writing—where is that prior writing regarding the hospital to be found? The two writings are not to be pieced together in order that a word or sentence in the one is to be transposed to the fitting place in the other, so as to make sense out of both when neither is intelligible in itself. But this is what the pursuers would have to do; for without transposition, but adding merely the latter to the first, and combining the two in their order, the writings would not be intelligible as a whole.

“Entertaining these views of the character of the two writings, the Lord Ordinary has felt no real hesitation in coming to the conclusion that they cannot be supported as valid testamentary writings. If this conclusion be correct, it is unnecessary to enter into consideration of the objection to the effectiveness of these writings on the ground of uncertainty. The Lord Ordinary has, accordingly, limited his ground of judgment to sustaining the second and third pleas of the defenders, as being sufficient, in his opinion, for the disposal of the case.”

¹ Stoddart v. Grant, in House of Lords, 28th June 1832, 1 Macqueen, 163.

² Attorney-General v. Smith, 1st March 1852, 14 D. 585.

³ Stoddart v. Grant, ut supra, and Baird v. Jaap and Others, 15th July 1856, ante, vol. xviii. p. 1246.

⁴ Stair, iv. 42, 19.

⁵ Ersk. iii. 9, 14.

No. 199.

June 26, 1857.
Provost and Magistrates of Dundee v.
Morris.

and deletions.¹ Erasures could not, in the general case, be supplied because the words there before were not extant. But, where the words used by the testator still existed, though cancelled, the Court looked at them; and would, where there was an evidently unintentional omission or deletion, remedy the mistake. They had even disregarded the express words used in giving effect to intention.² In England, it had been decided that to render a will intelligible it would be read with an addition³ where a legatee's name was deleted, but she was afterwards referred to as the "said E B." The Court held expunged words as existing.⁴ This was just what the pursuers asked to be done here; and that Mr Morgan intended the word "hospital" to remain was shewn by his leaving the article "an" undeleted before it, and referring afterwards to it as pre-existing, "the hospital at Dundee." The rest of the deletion had an object, but the deletion of this word had not. Undoubtedly, this writing was at one time a good expression of intention; and, though altered, there was no appearance of an intention to revoke displayed. Wherever the deceased revoked any writing which he had signed, the signature was deleted, and the signature of this writing had been allowed to stand. The deletions were done carefully. They were verbal alterations, and not revocations of the whole document. Even erasures could be supplied if written evidence existed of what the testator intended to be on the parts erased. In one case a duplicate deed afforded this evidence.⁵ Mr Morgan had, in fact, left duplicate writings, — those of 10th and 20th October. They referred to each other, and a blank—had such existed—in the one was to be supplied from the other. In another case,⁶ eight inoperative wills were the materials from which the Court had extracted intention. The deed by Mr Morgan of 6th September 1846 might be viewed as testamentary, if the words "the legacy duty to be paid for my servants" were holograph of Mr Morgan. It was signed and dated by him, confessedly, but these words were not admitted to be holograph. The pursuers appealed to ocular demonstration, which shewed them to be holograph. It had been held that a holograph addition such as this had set up a will otherwise inoperative.⁷ If so, there could be no doubt as to the effectual expression of a wish to establish an hospital. If these writings were not given effect to, Mr Morgan must be held to have died almost intestate. All the presumptions of law were against intestacy;⁸ more especially where the expression had reference to a charitable bequest.⁹

Senior counsel for the defenders was not called on to reply.¹⁰

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The Court does not think it necessary to call for any reply from the counsel for the defenders,—being quite satisfied that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary is well founded. I have not had time to prepare any written opinion; but the matter is so simple that it may be expressed in very few words. I am not prepared to admit that any portion of the writings, prior to the one of

¹ Stair, supra.

² Wedderspoon v. Thomson's Trustees, 15th December 1824, 3 S. and D. 396; Keiller v. Thomson's Trustees, 16th June 1826, 4 S. and D. p. 730.

³ Leach v. Meeklem, 27th May 1805 (King's Bench), 6 East. 486.

⁴ Martins v. Gardiner, 1st June 1836, 8 Simon, 73.

⁵ Earl of Strathmore v. Earl of Strathmore's Trustees, 30th July 1840, 1 Rob. App. 189.

⁶ Wedderspoon, ut supra.

⁷ M'Intyre, 1st March 1821, F. C.

⁸ Ersk. iii. 2, 23.

⁹ Hill v. Burns, 14th April 1826, 2 W. and S. 80, per Lord Gifford, p. 86.

¹⁰ The defenders cited Rankine v. Reid, 7th February 1849, ante, vol. xi. p. 543; Grants (Leith's Trustees) v. Shepherd, 21st July 1847, in House of Lords, vi. Bell's App. p. 153.

No. 199. 10th October 1842, remain operative to any extent, or can be at all looked at, because that latter writing expressly annuls and sets them aside, or demonstrates that the writer no longer entertained any such purposes as he had previously expressed. I apprehend, therefore, that these must be laid aside entirely.

June 26, 1857. Provost and Magistrates of Dundee v. Morris.

The notion, which was pressed upon us, of there being one general settlement, and that all the writings are to be clubbed together, so as to form something like a will, must also be laid aside as entirely inadmissible.

With regard to the writing of 10th October 1842, which is the first of the two writings chiefly founded on by the pursuers, we find the words, "I wish to establish in the town of Dundee, in the shire of Forfar," &c. What would be the effect of such words as burdening the next of kin, if followed out by anything to which the wish might be applied, it is not necessary to consider; for there follows nothing to which the wish can now possibly apply. The words which follow, so far as they could imply the object of the testator, have been struck out. In the other cases referred to, no question similar to the present arose. In the case of Martins v. Gairdner, it is true that the testator struck out in one place the Christian name of his sister, but he left it standing twice in other parts of the deed; and as he could not have two sisters married to the same man at the same time, the Court treated the case as one so clear and plain that they had no difficulty in supplying the name in the place where it was deleted. In the other case referred to,—the Scotch case,—there were clear subsequent authoritative words, sufficient to effect the wish of the testator. The present case seems altogether unprecedented. The whole object of the testator, supposing such an object to have been sufficiently expressed by the deleted words, is struck out; and the pursuers propose to restore it by conjectures, from something in the subsequent writing of 20th October 1842, which is in itself imperfect. They argue that from the words in the latter writing, "I hereby wish only 100 boys to be admitted in the hospital at Dundee," coupled with the words which still exist in the prior writing, it must be inferred that the testator then believed that the former writing existed entire,—that it was a valid operative writing,—and that we can therefore now supply the defect in that writing of which they say he must be held to have been unconscious. Now, this will never do. What are we to supply? Mr Patton argued that the only thing wanting to give significance to the writing of 10th October was the word "hospital;" and we are asked to restore that word,—to restore the very word which the testator had struck out, and without which the writing has no meaning; in short, we are asked to give meaning to a writing which the testator himself had deprived of all meaning.

A conjecture is made as to when the deletion in the first writing took place. If one were to form any conjecture on the subject, I suppose it was when the testator contemplated an hospital of a different description—viz. the one described in the improbative writing of 6th September 1846; and upon such a supposition as this, it is plain that the argument founded upon the terms of the writing of 20th October, or of any of the subsequent holograph writings, completely falls to the ground. But it is said that we are to take all these writings together, including even the writing of 6th September 1846, and that we are even to look at that which is not holograph, as proving the continuance of an intention to establish this hospital. Well, if we are to look at the writing of 6th September, it is clear that Mr Morgan's intention in regard to the hospital, as expressed in the writing of 10th October, did not continue and subsist. We can never, however, allow, on any conjecture or supposition, the words cancelled in the writing of the 10th of October to be re-inserted, in order to give meaning and effect to it, or to any of the other writings.

I confess my notion of the whole case is, that these papers must be taken as mere scrolls or jottings, from which the deceased intended at some time or another to have a settlement made up; but I think there is no valid or effectual writing that the Court can recognise. If they did, it would be the strongest case of making a will that was ever attempted.

LORD MURRAY.—I have never been able to take any other view of this case than that which has just been expressed by your Lordship. No doubt this Court, in a great many cases, has sustained bequests or legacies on an infinite variety of grounds. These grounds cannot, however, be transferred from one case to

No. 199.

June 26, 1857.
 Provost and Magistrates of Dundee v.
 Morris.

another, so as to make one an authority for the rest ; and it is quite absurd to treat such cases as governed by any general rule. Each case must be decided with reference to its own circumstances. Now, what I ask in this case is,—Have we any fair indication of a completed intention on the part of the testator to found an hospital at Dundee ? For my part, I can see nothing more in these writings than a variety of jottings, shewing that various ideas had been passing through Mr Morgan's head about an hospital,—about the number of boys to be admitted into it, and so forth. I quite agree with Mr Patton that if we could take a word from one writing and put it in the place of a word scratched out in another, it might help to explain the obliterated writings, and make them more intelligible than they are now. On any such principle, however, we would have a great deal to do here ; for indeed the great proportion of the writings are scratched out. They are almost all scratches,—the words left being rari nantes in gurgite vasto. Yet of these scratched-out writings, we are seriously asked to make a will to constitute an hospital. One cannot constitute an hospital without a great deal of reflection and consideration ; and it requires the skill of a practised conveyancer to bring all the things together which are requisite for that purpose. I see nothing in these writings to induce me to believe that the testator ever came to any final purpose about this hospital. I have no evidence before me,—I do not say of a legal nature, —but even of anything approaching to final intention to that effect ; and I cannot therefore see any ground for disturbing the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, or for doubting that the pursuers have not established their case. In short, taking these writings, with their double and single scratchings, I cannot make a will out of them.

LORD WOOD.—There can be no doubt of the soundness of the rule of construction, that the intention of the testator is to be given effect to, and that it is to be gathered from the whole testamentary writings left by him. They are to be viewed as one settlement, although they may be several in number. But while, in a general way, all writings having reference to, or purporting to deal with, the disposal of a testator's estate may be called testamentary, still, in its more strict and correct meaning, that only can be said to be a testamentary writing which is of such a description as to be capable of affecting the distribution of the estate. In that view, the writings must be probative, unless the defect be supplied by some special declaration by the testator, and in circumstances to which the present case has not a vestige of resemblance. Further, they must contain an expression in apt and intelligible language of the testator's intention. It is to such writings that the rule of construction applies.

In the present case, the testator, the late Mr Morgan, left no general settlement for the regulation of the succession to his property, and in connection with which any other writings might require to be considered in determining their effect. He only left several writings, whereby, it is said, he bequeathed or disposed of portions of his estate, and the efficacy of which can derive no aid from any reference to a general settlement by the testator,—none such existing.

Now, as regards these writings themselves, I shall first advert to the last in date, viz., that of the 6th September 1846. In the first place, I think, that, looking to the summons as laid, it is not in the case. The conclusions apply to an alleged bequest entirely different from the one supposed to be contained in that writing. In the second place, granting that the writing were within the summons, it does not appear to me that it is of any validity, even if the words alleged at the bar to be holograph were so, which, however, is not averred in the record, and is now denied. The case of M'Intyre, cited to support the validity, was one of circumstances essentially different. In the third place, I may observe, that if there were anything of efficacy in the writing, it would be entirely destructive of the pursuers' case, as founded on the earlier testamentary writings:—And even if (as seemed to be Mr Patton's view) it is only to be looked to as indicating intention, still it is not the intention said to be expressed in the other writings.

Then, with regard to these other writings, Mr Patton, to some extent, founded on that of 4th January 1836, which is cancelled or revoked by the writing of 10th October 1842. But referring to what your Lordship has already said, it does not occur to me that anything was submitted with respect to it which requires observation. Therefore I pass at once to the writing of 10th October 1842. A portion

No. 199. of it is deleted, which confessedly was done by Mr Morgan ; and I must hold that it was purposely and deliberately so deleted. It is impossible to listen to any contrary suggestion. The deleted portion therefore forms no part of the writing. But if the writing is read minus this no longer existing portion, it is unintelligible. Supposing,—although by no means admitting, for it is a point on which I avoid giving any opinion, as being unnecessary,—but supposing that the form of expression used, “I wish,” might have been sufficient, if the writing of the 10th October had remained entire to constitute per se, or, together with that of the 20th, a bequest which would be a burden on the representatives taking the testator's estate, still, as it actually stands, it is only the intimation that he had a wish, but what that wish was is not stated. Whatever it was, it has not pleased the testator to express it. Nay, it is even worse, for although deleted, the deleted part can be read, (and which, for the purposes of seeing whether it is in substantialibus, may competently be done), and when read, we see from it that the deletion is a deletion in substantialibus, inasmuch as it is one in the whole substance and body of the supposed intended bequest, so that in truth it is a recall of what the testator had expressed as his wish. It may have been his wish, but when the deletion was made, it ceased to be so ; or, at all events, that writing absolutely ceased to be the exponent of any wish on the part of the testator in the matter. It is the same as if the deleted portion had never been inserted in it. What then is the consequence ? Unavoidably this,—that the writing of 10th October is no longer a testamentary writing in the proper sense, as being capable of affecting the distribution of the testator's estate by any bequest therein made, although it may be good as a revocation of former wills, which portion of it remains. As respects the alleged bequest, and which may, at one time, have stood part of the deed, so as to be effectual (but upon which point I give no opinion), the deed is not a probative instrument, and cannot be restored. If it had consisted of distinct parts,—and so far as regards the revoking or cancelling portion of it, it does contain a separate and independent part,—it may remain probative as to them ; but as respects the cancelled part—the part taken out of it by deletion, and all that follows, which is inseparably connected with, and dependent on, the deleted portion,—it is improbative. The deletion is fatal to it. It is not a legal or effectual instrument. It is in fact,—so far as that part of it is concerned,—in the same condition as if it had never been made or did not exist. That portion of it cannot be restored or replaced by supplementing it from without by something extrinsic of the writing. This is the doctrine laid down both here and in the House of Lords in the case of Grant v. Spepheard, where the erasure was in a part of the dispositive clause of the deed there in question, upon which all the rest of the deed hung.

Well, then, if that be the state of the case as respects the writing of 10th October 1842, what is to be said as to the one of the 20th October of the same year ? I shall assume that the deletion in the former was made prior to the latter being written,—a fact, however, of which there is no evidence, and of which I apprehend, none can be competently adduced, so that it is impossible to say at what date it was made. Now, it is not contended that, per se, the writing of the 20th is a testamentary writing, which can affect the distribution of the testator's estate. How, then, is it to operate, to raise a valid bequest ? The suggestion was, that as it makes mention of an hospital at Dundee, and as you can still read the word “hospital” in the deleted part of the writing of the 10th October, with the rest of the words deleted, you are to replace in it these words, or at least the word “hospital,” and then, having done so, you are to read the writing of the 20th as having reference to that of the 10th, as so restored or renovated. The writing itself confessedly will not do. It is necessary to have the prior one,—which, of itself, also is inoperative ; but the last in date is to help out the first, and so make an effectual bequest by a valid instrument. This is a most singular proposal. Because the word “hospital” is found in a subsequent writing, it is to be inserted in another, from which it was of purpose deleted ; and the invalid deed is thus to be converted into a valid one. In short, the Court is to undo that which the testator deliberately did,—for so it must be held. You are to put into an instrument that which the testator deliberately took out of it ; and this upon some conjectural view, derived from the writing of the 20th October, that he must have supposed it still remained part of the writing of 10th October, although that writing was before his

June 26, 1857.
Provost and Magistrates of Dundee v.
Morris.

eyes when he wrote the one of the 20th October. I cannot imagine anything more extravagant. But, in truth, it is suggested with a total forgetfulness of the legal state and character of the writing of 10th October, which, as respected any bequest it might have contained, had—as I have already remarked—become a legal nullity. So far it had been rendered an improbativè, invalid, and ineffectual instrument, and was incapable of being brought to life again by any process of resuscitation. No-thing remained in which any words can be inserted. Legally, there is no writing in which to insert them. To place them in the blank said to be made by the deletion, would be to apply the signature of the testator to that to which he has not applied it, or rather, to that which he withdrew from it. This would be to falsify the writing as left by the testator himself.

No. 199.

June 26, 1857.

Provost and Magistrates
of Dundee v.
Morris.

All that can be said of the writing of 20th October (if even that), is, that it may shew that the testator imagined he had done something he had not done, and which he proposed to alter. But how can that raise into existence the thing which has not been done, or which was undone? The testator was in error, and by his error, it may be, his intentions, whatever they were, have become of none effect, and so it has happened in many cases.

I agree with the Lord Ordinary that “there is insuperable difficulty in connecting the one writing with the other.” Reading the first, as according to the rules of law it must be read, by holding the part deleted as pro non scripto,—it is radically defective, and so must be denied legal effect. Reading the second, as referring to a prior writing,—where is that prior writing regarding the hospital to be found? The two writings are not to be placed together, in order that a word or sentence in the one is to be transposed to the fitting place in the other, so as to make sense out of both, when neither is intelligible in itself. But this is what the pursuers would have to do; for without transposition, but adding merely the latter to the first, and combining the two in their order, the writings would not be intelligible as a whole.

The pursuers say all the writings must be read as if forming one continuous instrument. I do not admit that; but if they were, it would not, I think, avail them. Even then, the deletion in the writing of 10th October would be fatal. Nothing could be introduced to supply the part deleted, and without it, all that remained would not be sufficient (apart from any objection on the ground of uncertainty) to constitute a valid legacy. There would be nothing from which the intention of the testator could be legitimately collected.

I shall only add, that upon the assumption that the deletion in the writing of 10th October was not made till a date subsequent to the writing of the 20th, or it may equally be, subsequent to that of the 16th June 1843, containing the legacy to Lord Fullerton, and the request to him, which was so anxiously pressed upon us as a material feature in the case,—but to which I cannot attach the slightest importance,—the whole argument of the pursuers becomes, if possible, even more untenable than upon the assumption of the deletion having been made prior to the 20th of October. And for anything that has been submitted to us, I can see no ground on which it can be held to be established that the deletion was not made after June 1843, nor am I aware, how, in conformity to decided cases, the reverse could be proved, or how it can be instructed at what date it was made. That is a matter which must remain uncertain; and being so, the case of the pursuers is, in my opinion, surrounded by insuperable difficulties.

LORD COWAN.—I have little to add to the observations that have been made by your Lordships.

The summons concludes to have it declared that “the testamentary writings left by the said John Morgan, and mentioned in the said condescendence, contain a valid legacy and bequest of the whole of the residue of his moveable means and estate, after paying legacies, debts, and charges of administration, or at least of so much thereof as may be necessary for the purpose of erecting and establishing in the town of Dundee, an hospital to accommodate 100 boys, and that the same are valid and effectual as testamentary deeds of the deceased to that effect;”—and the question is, whether these writings are effectual in law to constitute such a legacy as that claimed in the summons?

In considering this question, it is of importance to carry along with us the fact, that no general settlement or trust-disposition of the whole of this gentleman's

No. 199. estate has been left by him. Questions have occurred as to testamentary writings, and letters even, which have been executed with reference to powers reserved in a general settlement of the testator's affairs, or under the implied power of alteration competent at common law. We have no such case to deal with in disposing of the claim by the pursuers under the alleged testamentary writings found in the repositories of the deceased.

June 26, 1857. Provost and Magistrates of Dundee v. Morris.

After considering the case with all the attention in my power, I must, in the first place, refuse to look at the writing of 6th September 1846. It is true that all the testamentary papers found in the repositories of a deceased are to be looked at; but we must first of all be satisfied that papers alleged to be so, truly are testamentary writings. The principle was never recognised, that because we are to look at all the testamentary writings left by a deceased party, to ascertain his will as to his succession, we are therefore to look at every scrap of paper found in his repositories, whether it is probative or not, or holograph or not. The writings must be such as to permit of their being read as containing an authentic expression of the testator's intention; and if they are neither tested nor holograph, they cannot be looked at. But the paper of 6th September is admitted to be in the handwriting of the sister, and to have been found in her, and not in the deceased's repositories. I must, therefore, put out of the case altogether this writing of September 1846.

The sole question is, whether, under the writings of 10th and 20th October 1842, such a legacy has been bequeathed as is concluded for in the summons? Now, as has been said, there has been left no general settlement. The deceased must be taken as having died intestate generally; but, no doubt, there may be a valid specific legacy by one who, otherwise, may have died intestate. That is an acknowledged principle in the law of Scotland; and we have recognised such bequests or legacies, where the next of kin has succeeded to the general estate on account of intestacy. The question is, whether these writings are of that character? None of the other writings have respect to the particular bequest sought to be enforced, except those of 10th and 20th October; and it is out of these that this specific bequest must be brought.

It is an admitted fact that the writings come under our consideration in the precise state in which they were left by the testator, and found in his repositories. I take that as the admitted state of the facts upon the record; and it was not disputed in the argument of parties. Therefore, we have to deal with these two documents as standing in the precise state and condition in which the deceased left them. That being the case, the legal presumption is, that the altered condition in which these papers have been found must have been done by the testator himself.—Vide case of Naismyth, House of Lords, 27th July 1821. Nothing was shewn or alleged to the contrary.

Now the writings are deleted in most important respects; and that raises two questions of law as to the effect of deletions like these. I don't know any other principle ever recognised in the law of Scotland than that contained in the passage quoted from Lord Stair. In that passage, when dealing with deletions, he says that they are fatal when they are made in substantialibus,—that when the words are altogether obliterated, so as to be incapable of being read, they are to be taken as deletions in substantialibus, invalidating the deed in which they occur; but that if the deleted words can be read, then they are to be read for the purpose of seeing whether they are in substantialibus or not. Accordingly, that was acted upon in the case of Shepherd v. Grant, both in this Court and in the House of Lords, although not in the extreme way contended for by Mr Penney, viz., that the deed in all its parts is rendered inoperative and void. It was not necessary to go that length; and in reading the Lord Chancellor's opinion, you will find that he guarded himself against any such extreme conclusion. What was held was, that the essential vitiation destroyed that provision of the deed in which it occurred, and whatever depended on it; that the deed was to that extent to be held a bad deed.

Taking this principle, what have we here? In the deed of 10th October, we have the word "hospital," and certain words which follow it, deleted. I think that deletion blotted out all that was there with reference to the hospital. Then we come to the deed of 20th October. This deed seems to me entirely an ancillary or auxiliary deed. It was intended to supplement something which the writer intended to make as a provision of the will and settlement of his estate after his death; but if it is an ancillary deed, and if the main deed is rendered void by reason of the deletions in it, does not the ancillary deed become null too? It is plain upon its terms that it cannot of itself be taken as giving a legacy. It merely wishes so and so, in reference to something already declared; but if the primary bequest has been altogether expunged or blotted out, how can this ancillary deed stand?

No. 199.

June 27, 1857.
Halliday v.
Morison.

The Court has never recognised the principle that obliterations like these may be read in order to ascertain the intention of the testator. No authority was referred to for that; and, indeed, in the argument the pursuers did not contend for any such view; but merely, that the two writings taken together, so far as not deleted, were enough to support their demand. I concur with Lord Wood, and on the same grounds, in thinking it impossible so to combine the two writings as to hold them to contain an effectual declaration of the testator's will.

One word more. It is to guard myself against being held committed to the opinion indicated by the Lord Ordinary in his note, that supposing these two writings of 10th and 20th October were otherwise unexceptionable, they are so expressed as to constitute a valid legacy or will. I am not at all satisfied on that point. The Lord Ordinary refers to the case of Dundas; but that is a case where there was a complete testamentary deed; and the question had reference to a supplementary codicil to that deed. I beg, therefore, to be understood as giving no opinion on the question whether these writings, though undeleted, would be sufficient to establish the legacy to the effect concluded for in the summons. I think it is somewhat problematical whether there ever was anything in the testator's mind beyond a vague wish to make a settlement of the kind pointed at, but which he never carried into effect by the execution of a valid deed.

THE COURT adhered, and found the pursuer liable in additional expenses.

JOHN ROGERS, S.S.C.—WEBSTER & RENNY, W.S.—ADAM & KIRK, W.S.—Agents.

MRS ISABELLA GRAHAM OR HALLIDAY, Pursuer.—Logan.

No. 200.

MRS JEAN CARRUTHERS OR MORISON, Defender.—Pattison—F. W. Clark.

Reduction—Imbecility—Fraud.—In a reduction of a disposition, averments which—(aff. judgment of Lord Ardmillan)—Held sufficient to entitle the pursuer to an issue, on the ground of mental incapacity, but not of fraud and circumvention.

Process—Jury Trial—Notice—Time of Trial—Act 13 & 14 Vict. cap. 36, sect. 40.—A reclaiming note for the pursuer was refused. He then, on 23d June, moved the Lord Ordinary to fix a day for trial before himself, and the defender gave notice of trial for the sittings;—Held (1), that the defender could not thus deprive the pursuer of the lead, and notice accordingly discharged; but (2), that by trying a desperate point the pursuer had created delay, which entitled the defender to indulgence in preparing for the trial, as he was not bound to be preparing for trial during the dependence of the reclaiming note; and therefore the trial postponed to the sittings, although the fact that the Lord Ordinary could only fix a day just at the end of the session was not a ground for such postponement.

THE pursuer, Mrs Isabella Graham or Halliday, was the natural daughter of Anne Palmer, to whom and her sister Elizabeth Palmer, jointly, and to the longest liver of them, certain trust-subjects were conveyed by their brother, now deceased; whom failing, to the pursuer. Elizabeth Palmer, having survived her sister, disposed these subjects in 1839 to the late Alexander Morison. The pursuer now brought a reduction of that disposition on the ground of facility, fraud, and circumvention, which action was directed against Mr Morison's widow, who now occupied the property.

June 27, 1857.
1st Division.
Ld. Ardmillan.
C.

The pursuer alleged that "the said Elizabeth Palmer, besides being blind, and labouring under other physical defects, was a person of great mental imbecility, utterly incapable of transacting or understanding business of the simplest description, and was unable, in any way, to take the management

No. 200.
 —
 June 27, 1857.
 Halliday v.
 Morison.

of her own affairs. She was, indeed, generally regarded by her friends and acquaintances as little, if at all, removed from idiocy. Anne Palmer, on the other hand, her sister, and the pursuer's mother, was a person of shrewdness and ability, and, while she lived, took the management of the subjects which the sisters jointly possessed between them. On her death, which occurred on or about 7th March 1833, Elizabeth was left without any one to look after, or attend properly to her interest; and, in consequence of this, Thomas Jardine, writer in Moffat, appears to have assumed the entire management of her affairs; that he, without authority from, and without even the knowledge of, the said Elizabeth Palmer, obtained her infest in the subjects conveyed to her and her deceased sister;" that the rents were sufficient for her wants, but that "notwithstanding of this, Mr Jardine, to serve purposes in which Elizabeth Palmer had no interest, prepared a bond for L.200 over the property; the money was to be lent by his own clients, and no other agent, so far as the pursuer knows, was employed." That without instructions from Elizabeth Palmer, or making her aware of what was proposed to be done, he prepared a bond, and having brought it to her for execution, he went through the formality of taking her by the hand, and making her touch his own pen, he acting as notary on the occasion; that Elizabeth Palmer never understood what took place; that the creditors in the bond being afterwards desirous of getting the loan paid up, Jardine brought the subjects to sale, at first unsuccessfully, but that "at length, on or about the 4th of February 1839, Jardine contrived to prevail upon Archibald Morison, mason in Moffat, late husband of the defender, Jean Carruthers or Morison, and now deceased, to purchase the subjects in question for the sum of L.411, being about one-third of their value. The said Archibald Morison was well aware of the mental imbecility under which Elizabeth Palmer laboured, of her utter inability to understand or transact business, and that any deed executed by her must, if brought under challenge, be found altogether null and void. Nevertheless, as the price asked was extremely small, he agreed with Jardine to become the purchaser, and take any risk of challenge which might afterwards arise." The pursuer then stated that the disposition to Morison was not understood by Elizabeth Palmer, and was not read over to her; that she had never received payment of the price; that she the pursuer had refused to homologate the transaction; that on the death of Elizabeth Palmer, the pursuer was entitled to succeed to the subjects; that "the pretended sale and disposition of these subjects brought under reduction, were fraudulently carried through and obtained by the said Thomas Jardine and Archibald Morison; they were not the act and deed of the said Elizabeth Palmer. She was not at the time of sound disposing mind; granted no authority to Jardine, or any other person, to effect and execute the same for her; was not at the time aware of what was being done, and remained ever afterwards in ignorance thereof. The said sale was a transaction into which no persons capable of managing their own affairs would have entered."

The pursuer proposed to take the following issues:—

"1. Whether the disposition No. 10 of process, bearing to be made and granted by the deceased Elizabeth Palmer, on the 4th day of February 1839, is not the deed of the said Elizabeth Palmer? and,

"2. Whether, on or about the said 4th day of February 1839, the said Elizabeth Palmer, being of a weak and facile state of mind, the late Thomas Jardine, writer in Moffat, taking advantage of her said facility, did, by fraud or circumvention, impetrate or obtain the said deed from the said Elizabeth Palmer? and whether the defender's author, the late Archibald Morison, carter, Moffat, accepted of the said deed in the knowledge of the weakness and facility of the granter, and the fraud and circumvention by which the same was obtained?"

The defender pleaded;—That the pursuer had not set forth title or interest to insist in the action, and had made no relevant statement to support the grounds of reduction maintained. “3. Separately, there is no relevant statement to support the reduction on the ground of fraud and circumvention, or of defect in the solemnities required by law.”

No. 200.

—
June 27, 1857.
Halliday v.
Morison.

The Lord Ordinary, on 4th June 1857, pronounced the following interlocutor:—“Finds that the pursuer’s averments on record are sufficient to entitle her to prove that the deed sought to be reduced is not the deed of Elizabeth Palmer, and approves of the first issue proposed by the pursuer: Finds that the pursuer has not relevantly and sufficiently alleged against Archibald Morison fraud and circumvention, as actor or participant in the act of Jardine, in procuring from Elizabeth Palmer the deed sought to be reduced: Finds that the pursuer has not relevantly and sufficiently alleged that Archibald Morison was in the knowledge that the said deed was procured by Jardine from Elizabeth Palmer by fraud and circumvention: Finds that no special defect in the solemnities required by law has been alleged: Therefore sustains the third plea in law for the defenders; and appoints the cause to be enrolled for further procedure, reserving all questions of expenses.” *

The pursuer reclaimed; but the Court, without hearing the respondent, refused the note, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary to proceed with the cause.

On 24th June, the case again came before the Court as to fixing a time and place of trial. The issues having been adjusted on Saturday the 20th June, the pursuer, on Tuesday the 23d, moved the Lord Ordinary, under sect. 40 of the Court of Session Act, to fix a day for trial before himself. His Lordship continued the cause till the following Saturday, for the purpose of doing so; but, in the meantime, the defenders gave notice of trial for the sittings, thereby depriving the pursuer of the lead. The case now came before the Court on the pursuer’s motion to discharge the notice of trial by the defender.

Clark, for the pursuer, maintained that such notice was altogether irregular. Besides interfering with the pursuer’s lead, it would also have the effect of taking the case from the Lord Ordinary.

Pattison, for the defender;—This notice is only in accordance with the practice hitherto observed.

LORD PRESIDENT.—It is fixed that a pursuer cannot be deprived of his lead in this way. This notice must be discharged.

The defender’s notice having been accordingly discharged, the pursuer then moved the Lord Ordinary to fix the day of trial for the 15th July.

* “NOTE.—The deed sought to be reduced is a disposition of property, not a testamentary deed. The pursuer alleges that the price was very inadequate. The averments of mental incapacity appear sufficient, if proved, to support the conclusion for reduction on this ground; and the facts must be investigated.

“But the deed is dated in February 1839, and this action is raised in November 1856, after the death of Mr Jardine, the agent of Elizabeth Palmer, who is alleged to have acted on her behalf, and to have carried through the transaction of sale. He was not the agent of Morison, and for his acts Morison is not responsible. The pursuer does not represent Elizabeth Palmer; and it is the condition of the question in regard to fraud and circumvention, that Elizabeth Palmer, if not circumvented and induced by fraud to grant the deed, was capable of doing so. In such circumstances, distinct and specific averments of fraud are necessary, and the defender’s author, Morison, must be distinctly alleged to have been participant in, or cognizant of, the particular fraud set forth. This has not been done; everything here is vague, loose, and indefinite on these important points; so much so, that action cannot be sustained, except to the effect and extent involved in the first issue.”

No. 200. The defender objected; and the Lord Ordinary, of this date, reported the cause.

June 27, 1857.
Carron Co. v.
Stainton's
Trustees.

Pattison, for the defender;—The trial ought to be fixed for the sittings. By the pursuer's own conduct in reclaiming much time has been wasted, and during a valuable period of the session, from the 3d to the 20th June. She is not now, therefore, entitled to hurry on the trial for the third last day of the session. The Court is not bound to grant this motion, and it is only just to the defender to fix the trial for the sittings.

Logan, for the pursuer;—No reasonable cause has been shown for refusing this motion. During the currency of the reclaiming note, the defender ought to have been preparing for the trial, because it was fixed that the pursuer was entitled to at least one of the issues proposed by her. The objection to the pursuer's motion practically is, that the defender would prefer having the case tried at the sittings. That was not an objection which the Court would sustain.¹

LORD PRESIDENT.—This objection is put on two grounds—1st, the period of the session; and, 2d, the limited time for preparation since the judgment of the Court on the issues. I do not feel disposed to give effect to the first ground; but in regard to the second, I think it is in the circumstances reasonable. There has been apparently no great hurry on the part of the pursuer. The issues were adjusted by the Lord Ordinary on grounds which were very plain. We were quite clear upon the matter too, but by trying that desperate point, the pursuer delayed the case, and therefore I think it is reasonable that the parties should have a few more days to prepare for the trial. The defender was not bound to be preparing for trial during the currency of the reclaiming note. The pursuer is to blame for this delay; and when the only delay asked is for a week or so, I think it is a very reasonable request.

The rest of the Court concurred.

TRIAL fixed for the sittings.

WILLIAM MACKERSY, W.S.—JOHN M'CRACKEN, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 201. THE CARRON COMPANY, Pursuers.—Penney—Moir—Mackenzie.
HENRY TIBBATS STAINTON AND OTHERS (Stainton's Trustees), Defenders.—D. F. Inglis—Young.

Process—Jury Trial—Remit to an Accountant before answer.—In an action of accounting, which the pursuer desired to have sent to a jury at once, the Lord Ordinary, before farther procedure, remitted certain points to an Accountant, thinking his report might supersede the necessity of a jury trial, and would be useful in any view. The pursuer reclaimed, but the Court adhered, making the remit “before answer.”

June 27, 1857. SEE supra, p. 318.

1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Mackenzie
L.

The point to which the attention of the Court was now directed was thus stated by the Lord Ordinary in a note:—

“This is an action of great importance to the parties, from the magnitude of the sums involved, the amount of principal and interest concluded for, as at 31st December 1851, being L.108,490, 19s. 4d.

“The pursuers contend that the case should be sent at once for trial by jury, but this is opposed by the defenders; and the Lord Ordinary thinks that the most expedient course, in the first instance, is to obtain a report from an Accountant on the special points referred to in the interlocutor, leaving it to be afterwards determined, if any further inquiry shall be found necessary, what course of investigation should be adopted.

¹ Mushet v. Duke of Buccleuch, 2d Feb. 1856, ante, vol. xviii. p. 486.

“ This is not one of the enumerated causes which it is imperative to try by a jury. It was originally brought as a simple action of accounting, as will be seen from the summons raised on 17th July 1855, which concludes against the defenders for L.69,617, 1s. 6d. of principal, and L.38,873, 17s. 10d. of interest, said to be due upon Mr Stainton's accounts at 31st December 1851,—all conform to a particular state of debt produced, No. 6 of process. Against this action the defences of settled account and mora were pleaded. With the view of obviating these defences, the pursuers raised a supplementary summons on 29th January 1856, concluding to have it found and declared that the accounts rendered by Mr Stainton from 1825 to 1851, ‘are false and fraudulent, and that the sums therein stated as charges against the pursuers were, to the amount of L.69,617, 1s. 6d., fraudulently appropriated by the said deceased Henry Stainton to his own use out of the funds of the pursuers in his hands;’ and this is followed by petitory conclusions similar to those in the original summons. The supplementary summons having been conjoined with the original one, a record was made up and closed, and the two leading pleas maintained by the pursuers are, ‘ 1st, the defenders, the trustees and representatives of the late Henry Stainton, are bound to hold just count and reckoning with the pursuers for his intrusions with their funds and effects while acting as their agent in London, and to make payment to the pursuers of such sum as may be found to be due to them upon the accounts, with interest as libelled;’ and ‘ 2d, the said deceased Henry Stainton having fraudulently appropriated to his own use the funds of the pursuers to the extent stated in the condescendence, the pursuers are entitled to recover the amount with interest from the defenders, as his trustees and representatives.’

No. 201.
June 27, 1857.
Carron Co. v.
Stainton's
Trustees.

“ In accordance with these pleas, the pursuers at first submitted two issues for trial by a jury, one of simple accounting, and the other raising the question as to the alleged fraudulent appropriation of their funds by Mr Stainton to the extent of L.69,617, 1s. 6d. of principal, as specified in the state of debt, No. 6 of process. They have since given up the first issue, and they propose to go to trial on the second. After deliberate consideration, however, the Lord Ordinary is satisfied that to send the case in its present shape to be tried by a jury, would be extremely inconvenient and unsatisfactory, and expose the parties to the greatest hazard of injustice and miscarriage.

“ Laying aside the defences founded on settled account and mora, it will be seen from the record that the main question upon which the parties are at issue relates to the remuneration to which Mr Stainton was entitled for conducting the business of the London agency from 1825 till his death in December 1851. He had acted as agent of the Carron Company in London from the year 1808 till he died, and the business was very extensive. Prior to 30th June 1825, Mr Stainton appears to have been remunerated for his services as agent by a commission of five per cent on ready money sales, and on open accounts for sales on credit, exclusive of military stores; a commission of two and a half per cent on military stores sold by him to merchants, and a salary for conducting business with the Board of Ordnance and other public boards, and with foreign powers, at the rate of L.250 a-year during war, and L.100 a-year in the time of peace. He was also allowed the expenses of his journeys to and from Woolwich, and the sums disbursed by him while there for himself, and with the yard and board officers. It is averred by the pursuers that after 30th June 1825, this mode of remuneration was discontinued by a resolution of the Company, and that from that date to the close of his agency in 1851, Mr Stainton was to be restricted to a fixed salary of L.2000 per annum, with a free house, and allowances for coal, candle, and taxes. This is denied by the defenders, who put a different

No. 201.
 —
 June 27, 1857.
 Carron Co. v.
 Stainton's
 Trustees.

construction on the resolution of the Company, and contend that it only refers to one year, from 30th June 1825 to 30th June 1826.

“According to the view the Lord Ordinary takes of the case, this point will be found to be at the root of the whole controversy between the parties, and it appears to him to be one peculiarly adapted for investigation by an Accountant:—Was Mr Stainton entitled to a commission upon the sales from 1825 to 1851, or was he restricted to a fixed salary of L.2000 a-year during that period? If the accounts be still open for investigation, it is obvious that the ultimate balance to be brought out in December 1851 will be most deeply affected according as the one view or the other is adopted.

“On the record the pursuers have distinctly explained the mode in which they have made up the state of debt, No. 6 of process, bringing out the principal sum of L.69,617, 1s. 6d., and L.38,873, 17s. 10d. of periodical interest, as due by the defenders in December 1851. They state, that in the half-yearly accounts rendered by Mr Stainton from 30th June 1825 till his death in December 1851, there are no charges entered either for commission or salary eo nomine; that there are general entries in these accounts under the heads ‘sundry charges and expenses,’ and the like, which are placed to the debit of the Company, and to the credit of Mr Stainton, in his private books; that these entries are unvouched, and that there never were any vouchers applicable to them; that all entries of this description, from June 1825 to December 1851, have been brought together in the state, No. 6 of process, and that the sundries thus unvouched and improperly charged amount to L.122,617, 1s. 6d., exclusive of interest. From this the pursuers deduct L.2000 per annum as Mr Stainton’s salary, from 1825 to 1851, and thus bring out the sum of L.108,490, 19s. 4d. of principal and interest due by the defenders at 31st December 1851.

“That these general entries of ‘sundry charges and expenses’ were brought under the notice of the Carron Company, in these terms, in the half-yearly accounts which Mr Stainton rendered to them from 1825 to 1851, is not disputed. And the defenders maintain that the Company and its managers, when they received these accounts periodically, must have known what these entries were intended to comprehend, and must have satisfied themselves of their accuracy; and that, at all events, if any explanations or vouchers were required, it was their duty to call for them at the time when the transactions were of recent date, and admitted of being easily cleared up. As to the general allegations, that the entries are false and fraudulent, and that Mr Stainton fraudulently appropriated the funds of the Company to his own use, the defenders contend that they are mere random averments, made in bad faith, which ought to be disregarded, and that the case on its merits must be dealt with substantially as an action of accounting.

“Whatever opinion may be formed on these points, the Lord Ordinary thinks it of essential importance, as the case now stands, to obtain a report from an Accountant, with the view of ascertaining, 1st, Whether the accounts periodically rendered by Mr Stainton, from 1825 to 1851, were settled, approved of, or passed by the Company; and, 2d, Whether the general entries in the pursuers’ state of debt, No. 6 of process, consist of commission charges on sales instructed by the transactions recorded in the books and accounts, and of travelling expenses, or other disbursements connected with the London agency, for which it is not usual to take or preserve vouchers.

“In a certain result of that investigation no further proceedings may be necessary. But, even if the case should ultimately go to trial before a jury, it is thought the greatest advantage will be derived from the report of the Accountant on the special points embraced in the remit.”

The Lord Ordinary, on 20th March 1857, pronounced the following interlocutor:—“Having heard counsel for the parties, and considered the closed record, before further procedure, remits to Mr Archibald Borthwick, Accountant in Edinburgh, to examine the books of the Carron Company, and the accounts and documents produced, with reference to the averments of the parties contained in the record, and to report,—1st, What was the mode in which the late Mr Henry Stainton kept the books and accounts applicable to the business carried on by him as agent for the Carron Company in London: 2d, Whether the accounts which were transmitted by Mr Stainton half-yearly to the Company, from 30th June 1825 till his death in December 1851, appear to have been examined periodically by the Company, or those acting for them; and, if so, to state the nature of the examination which took place, to what extent vouchers were exhibited or called for, and how far explanations were asked or given by correspondence or otherwise, and whether the accounts so rendered appear to have been settled or approved of, adopted and passed by the Company: 3d, What were the charges allowed to Mr Stainton in name of commission, or otherwise, for conducting the business of the London agency prior to 30th June 1825, and in what manner these charges were entered in the accounts periodically rendered by him to the Company: 4th, What charges appear to have been made by Mr Stainton as remuneration for conducting the London agency from 30th June 1825 till December 1851, and in what manner these charges were entered in the accounts periodically rendered by him as aforesaid: 5th, Whether there are any entries in the books and accounts of the Carron Company, or of the London agency, shewing that after 30th June 1825, Mr Stainton was to be remunerated, not by charging the commission and other allowances previously made to him, but by a fixed salary of L.2000 a-year, with a free house, and certain allowances for coal, candle, and taxes: 6th, Whether the general entries and charges in the state, No. 6 of process, which are objected to by the Carron Company as unvouched, appear to consist of charges by Mr Stainton for conducting the business of the London agency from 30th June 1825 till December 1851, and whether the charges made by him for conducting the London agency after 30th June 1825—having regard to the extent of the business and other circumstances—appears to correspond with the commission and allowances made to him prior to that date; and whether there are means for ascertaining the particulars of which the general entries in the said state are composed, to what extent they relate to charges for commission or remuneration which are instructed by the business transactions recorded in the books and accounts, and how far they appear to consist of charges for outlay in travelling or other expenses connected with the London agency, for which it is not usual to take or preserve vouchers, or for which vouchers cannot now be reasonably required, keeping in view the length of time that has elapsed since the accounts were rendered, and the death of Mr Stainton and Mr Dawson, the manager at Carron, before the present action was raised: And, generally, to report upon any other points that may appear to the Accountant to be material for the information of the Court, with reference to the transactions in the state, No. 6 of process, founded on by the pursuers: With power to the Accountant to hear parties, and call for such books and documents as he may think necessary.”

The pursuers reclaimed, and pleaded;—That the interlocutor remitted matters to which they objected, and ought therefore to be recalled. The proper course was at once to adjust issues for trial.

The defenders pleaded;—That the only object of the remit was to narrow the points for discussion. Upon the points embraced in it, both parties had made averments.

LORD PRESIDENT.—It is not necessary to make many observations upon this case. I shall only say that there are points proposed to be investigated, which it would be very desirable to have ascertained before going farther; and there are none of

No. 201.

June 27, 1857.

Carron Co. v.
Stainton's
Trustees.

No. 201. them which, I think, would be unsuitable. But it is right to guard against it being supposed that this is taking evidence which will prevent parties going farther; and therefore I would suggest, that instead of the words "before farther procedure," the interlocutor should be "before answer."

June 27, 1857.
M'Ewan v.
Drummond.

LORDS IVORY and CURRIEHILL concurred.

LORD DEAS.—I concur in the course suggested by your Lordship. I do not say that there may not be, ultimately, a jury trial here. The case may turn out to be entirely one of accounting, or it may not. I think the report of an Accountant necessary, even though it were for no other purpose than to enable us to judge whether there ought to be a jury trial or not.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary reclaimed against, with this variation, that the words 'before farther procedure' shall be deleted, and the following words inserted in their room, viz. 'before answer, and without prejudice to any course of investigation that may hereafter be thought proper:' Find the reclaimers liable in expenses since the date of the interlocutor reclaimed against; and remit to the Auditor to tax the same, and to report to the Lord Ordinary; and remit to his Lordship to decern therefor, and to proceed farther in the cause as shall be just."

GIBSON-CRAIG, DALZIEL, & BRODIE, W.S.—MACKENZIE & BAILLIE, W.S.—Agents.

No. 202.

THOMAS M'EWAN, Petitioner.—Cook.

MRS MARGARET DRUMMOND, Respondent.—A. B. Shand.

Judicial factor—Statute 12 & 13 Vict. cap. 51, (Pupils Protection Act) sect. 27. —A factor loco tutoris to pupils within a few years of minority allowed to withdraw on the statement that his cautioner had died, and he was unable to find new caution in consequence of the annoyance his former cautioner had experienced from litigations at the instance of the pupils' mother.

Question, Whether a factor loco tutoris can only get quit of his office on cause shewn to the satisfaction of the Court?

June 27, 1857.
1st Division.
L.

THE petitioner was appointed factor loco tutoris to the pupil children of the late John Comrie in 1849. He now presented this petition for recall of his appointment, and for the appointment of a new factor. He stated that the management of the estate of the pupils, which consisted mainly of their interest in a farm, had for some time been intrusted to their mother, but that she had married again, and had thereafter raised an action against the petitioner for aliment of the pupils, and for wages to herself as a servant during the period she had managed the estate, which claims were ultimately adjusted;—that the petitioner's cautioner died on 26th day of January last, "and on his death being intimated to the Accountant of the Court of Session, the Accountant has called upon the petitioner, in terms of the 11th sect. of the statute 12th and 13th Vict. cap. 51, to find and lodge new caution. The petitioner has been unable to find caution, his friends having refused to become cautioners for him in this factory, from the risk and annoyance which his previous cautioner experienced, in consequence of the litigations before mentioned, and he therefore makes the present application to have the factory granted in his favour recalled, and to have his accounts audited and adjusted, with a view to the discharge of himself and the executor or representatives of the said deceased Thomas M'Ewan, senior, his late cautioner, and the appointment of a new factor to take charge of the pupils' affairs."

The pupils' mother and another party upon whose application the petitioner was appointed, lodged objections to the petition, on the ground that a change in the factory would be inexpedient, as the pupils would soon arrive at the age of minority, the one being twelve and the other ten years old. They had now no fault to find with the petitioner's management. His alleged difficulty in finding caution was a mere device to relieve himself of his office. He was a wealthy man; and, even if true, "he could readily avail himself of the provisions of section 27 of the Pupils Protection Act, by which caution might be limited, and the bond of a guarantee association accepted as sufficient." They therefore submitted that the present application should be refused.

No. 202.

June 27, 1857.

M'Ewan v.
Drummond.

The case was called on 20th June 1857.—

Cook, for the petitioner.—The Court are not in use to compel a person to remain in such an office when he is anxious to get out of it. It is not expedient to do so. The petitioner is also willing to pay the expense of this petition.

LORD IVORY.—I have very considerable doubt on principle as to recalling this appointment, and all the more if the application is to be dealt with on the footing of the factor not finding caution. If he refuses to find caution without assigning any good reason, it would be a most dangerous thing to allow him, in these circumstances, to withdraw from the factory. It has been said, in a case reported by Lord Hailes,¹ that "trustees must not imagine that whenever they are tired of their office they can slip their necks out of the collar and leave the trust to be extricated by the Court;" and it is an old principle, that if once a trustee accepts office, he cannot get rid of it by mere caprice. Now, a judicial factor is just a trustee, and if he accepts office he must assign reasonable cause for resigning. The Pupils Protection Act points out this general principle in all its enactments. A judicial factor cannot, as of right, ask for exoneration except at the termination of his office. Such I hold to be the general principle applicable to his resignation.

Then, with reference to caution, the question comes to be, whether the factor can really find caution or not? If he cannot, that is a good cause for accepting his resignation, for caution enters deeply into the safety of the estate, and it is the factor's duty, in these circumstances, to tender his resignation. But it is said that this factor is a wealthy man. I do not think we can take the estate off his hand at once; for, although he may not be in a position to get caution, he may be in a position to take advantage of section 27 of the Pupils Protection Act. Therefore the case turns entirely on this, whether reasonable cause has been assigned for this factor's resignation? Nothing now remains to be done but a very slight executorial duty, which will come to an end in two or three years. Shall the factor, now that he has been paid for all the trouble he has taken, put the estate to the additional expense of a new appointment, when he has it in his power to continue till the natural expiration of his office? It is not alleged that the trouble of the office does not suit his advanced age. It is only said that his actings had not been approved of by the pupils' mother. But all that is past; nothing now remains to be done but administrative duty; and therefore I think it dangerous to lay down a general principle that a factor is entitled, in these circumstances, to withdraw; and, so far as I can see, there is no admitted or proved reasonable cause in this case for doing so.

The case was continued. Of this date it was again called,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—I have again considered the point, whether a factor must shew some reason for thus withdrawing from his office. I give no opinion upon that general question. But I am of opinion that sufficient reason has been shewn for this party not continuing in office. This is not the bare case of a party proposing to withdraw without finding caution, but of caution having fallen by reason of the death of the cautioner. It is necessary for this party to find new caution. He says that his friends have refused to become caution, in consequence of the annoyance his former cautioner received. It is not always pleasant to ask one's friends to be cautioners, and not surprising that they should refuse. Therefore I think

¹ Carstairs, 20th January, 1776, 2 Hailes, 678.

No. 202. the petitioner has stated sufficient reason why he should not be prevented withdrawing, assuming such withdrawal competent. I also think that the proper course is to allow the factor to withdraw, and to appoint a new factor in his place.
 June 30, 1857. Pilling v. Drake.
 LORD CURRIEHILL.—I agree.
 LORD DEAS.—I also concur.

LORD IVORY.—What I stated the other day rested on the abstract question rather than on a mature consideration of the present case. I was rather under the impression that there was not sufficient reason here for granting this application, but it is quite sufficient for me that it seems otherwise to your Lordships.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—“Recall the appointment of the said Thomas M'Ewan as factor loco tutoris to the said Helen and Margaret Comrie, and appoint Mr Robert Spottiswood, accountant in Edinburgh, to be factor loco tutoris to them, with the usual powers, he finding caution before extract, and decern ad interim; and quoad ultra remit to the junior Lord Ordinary to enquire into the facts, and to report.”

JAMES BUCHANAN, S.S.C.—PATERSON & ROMANES, W.S.—Agents.

No. 203.

THOMAS PILLING, Appellant.—Fraser—D. M. Smith.

GEORGE DRAKE, Respondent.—Napier—A. Mure.

Bankruptcy—Process—Appeal—Proof—Stamp—Statutes 2 & 3 Vict. c. 41, sect. 128; 16 & 17 Vict. c. 53, sect. 7; and 19 & 20 Vict. c. 79.—A claim on a bankrupt estate was rejected by the trustee, as being vouched by an unstamped promissory-note. The Sheriff, by one interlocutor, allowed production of further evidence, consisting of the bankrupt's books, &c., then in the trustee's hands; and, on consideration of the productions made, he sustained the claim. This last judgment the trustee appealed against;—Held (abs. Lord Justice-Clerk), (1) that under this appeal it was competent to review the first interlocutor; (2) that that interlocutor was right, though granted within two months of the date of payment of the first dividend; (3) that the debt claimed being entered in the state of their affairs given in by the bankrupts, which was corroborated by entries in their books, it was the duty of the trustee to have called for further evidence, instead of rejecting the claim; and (4) that, in the circumstances, the claim was good.

Question, Whether a promissory-note, not properly stamped, may be looked at as evidence of a loan transaction.

June 30, 1857. GEORGE DRAKE claimed as a creditor on the sequestrated estate of Reid and Saunders, leather merchants in Dundee, for the sum of L.166, 14s. The trustee rejected “this claim, because the vouchers produced are promissory-notes, and being unstamped as promissory-notes, are therefore illegal.” In an appeal against this deliverance, the Sheriff-substitute of Forfar (Henderson), within two months of the payment of the first dividend, allowed the appellant to produce in proof of his claim “the bankrupt's books, and any other documents relating to the subject-matter of this appeal in the trustee's hands.” After hearing parties on the productions made, he pronounced the following interlocutor, in which, and in the note, are stated the particulars of the claim and evidence:—“Finds that the appellant in his affidavit claims to be ranked on the sequestrated estate of the bankrupts for two different sums—viz. L.106, 14s., being for cash advanced in loan, as per acknowledgment therefor, dated 11th March 1856; and for the sum of L.60, being likewise for cash advanced in loan, as per acknowledgment, dated 26th March 1856, making together the sum of L.166, 14s.: Finds that the trustee by his deliverance rejected these claims, because the vouchers produced are alleged to be promissory-notes, and being unstamped as promissory-notes, that the claims therefor are illegal: Finds that this is the sole ground assigned by the trustee for rejecting the claims; and the deliverance sets forth, that if the claims had been admitted, the dividend would have been L.31, 5s. 1d., or thereby: Finds that the evidence rejected by the trustee with reference to the first mentioned sum of L.106, 14s., is written upon a penny-stamp, No. 203. and bears the signature of the firm of the bankrupts, and is thus expressed: 'Received from Mr George Drake' (the appellant) 'the sum of one hundred and six pounds fourteen shillings sterling, in loan, to be repaid one month after date, interest at the rate of 8 per cent (to be added) from 26th February.' And the other voucher granted for the L.60 is, in like manner, written upon a penny-stamp, and is also signed by the firm of the bankrupts, and is in these terms: 'Received from Mr George Drake the sum of sixty pounds sterling, in loan, to be repaid in two days:' Finds that, besides this last mentioned receipt or voucher, there is also produced a cheque by the appellant of the same date (26th March 1856), upon his account with the Dundee Banking Company, payable to the bankrupt Peter Saunders, or bearer, for L.60, and upon which cheque his name is indorsed, on receiving the money from the bank: Finds that, during the discussion of the appeal, and additional appeal remitted thereto, sundry excerpts had been recovered from the books of the bankrupts, and which excerpts are authenticated and produced: Finds that the evidence produced in support of the appellant's claim, to be ranked as a bona fide creditor upon the estates of the bankrupts, is sufficient to entitle the appellant to be ranked as claimed by him, and that the sole cause assigned by the trustee in his deliverance—viz. that the vouchers produced are promissory-notes, and being unstamped as promissory-notes, are illegal, is not a good ground for rejecting the claim of a bona fide creditor to be ranked upon the sequestrated estate, when such debt is supported by evidence: Finds that the trustee's objection, founded solely on the stamp-laws, may be a good objection to deprive a promissory-note of the privileges which belong to bills of that description as to legal diligence, but that the technical objection does not destroy the claim to be ranked, where the debt or loan is proved to have been made bona fide. In such circumstances, sustains the appeal, alters the trustee's deliverance, and remits to him to rank the appellant upon the sequestrated estate, in terms of his claim, and decerns: Finds the appellant entitled to expenses, allows an account thereof," &c. *

2D DIVISION.
 Sheriff-substitute of Forfar-shire.

I.

June 30, 1857.
Pilling v.
Drake.

Against this judgment the trustee appealed. Parties were first heard as to the evidence relating to the item of L.106, 14s.

It was pleaded for the trustee;—The terms of the only voucher had been

* "NOTE.—There are certain discrepancies as to dates, between the evidence founded upon by the appellant and the certified excerpts from the bankrupt's books produced. The entry in the books with reference to the L.106, 14s., bears to be dated 25th February 1856, whereas the receipt written on the penny-stamp founded on, is dated 11th March following; but it is proper to notice that this receipt bears these words, 'interest at the rate of 8 per cent to be added from 26th February,' that is the day after the date of the entry in the excerpt of the cash-book. The interest being made to run from 26th February (the date of the advance), is evidence of the advance having been then made, although the receipt for that advance was not written out till 11th March following. This explanation shews that there is no discrepancy between the time the advance was made and the date of the acknowledgment, although that acknowledgment was not written out for some time after the advance.

"Again, with regard to the L.60, the excerpt entry from the appellant's cash-book bears date 17th March 1856, whereas both the receipt on the penny-stamp and the cheque upon the Dundee Bank bear date the 26th March 1856. The receipt and bank-cheque are both consistent, and afford evidence of the advance of the money on the 26th March, and the prior entry in the cash-book of the 17th March cannot be reconciled with the subsequent advance, although it may be explained as relating to some temporary advance for the like sum, not connected with the advance of the 26th of March. If so, that temporary advance may have been paid, but of this there is no evidence."

No. 203. held to constitute a promissory-note,¹ and not being written upon a bill or note-stamp of the proper value, could not be received even as evidence, so he had therefore no course open but to reject the claim.² The creditor still had his remedy in getting an equalising payment on establishing the debt, and the rejection of his claim to rank for the first dividend was the appropriate punishment for his neglect to have his claim properly vouched. The documents produced before the Sheriff in support of the claim, were insufficient. The bankrupt's books, the bill, and the excerpts from the books of the bank, did not tally. Moreover, they ought not to be looked at, for the date of the Sheriff's interlocutor allowing them to be produced being within two months of the date of payment of the first dividend, it was incompetent to have produced them to the trustee, and equally so in a question as to ranking for that dividend to produce them to the Sheriff. The interlocutor allowing them to be produced could be reviewed without a special appeal against it, the whole case being brought up by the appeal against his final judgment under the summary mode of procedure provided by the Bankrupt Act.

June 30, 1857.
Pilling v.
Drake.

It was answered for the creditor;—The interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute admitting the vouchers to be produced was final, not having been appealed against.³ The trustee being in possession of the bankrupt's books, &c., which sufficiently vouched the debt claimed, it could not be objected that the creditor had failed to produce the vouchers necessary; and supposing these vouchers did not sufficiently prove the claim, it was the duty of the trustee to have called on the creditor to amend his claim.⁴ The claim being to a certain extent vouched by the document produced, and the other evidence being the books in his own hands, the most expedient course would have been for the trustee to have called for further evidence;⁵ and the Sheriff-substitute properly ordered further evidence.

LORD WOOD.—I am of opinion that the Sheriff was right in allowing the production of further evidence. No doubt by sect. 102 the creditor is required to produce the vouchers of his claim along with his affidavit two months before the date at which the dividend is payable. But under the statute it was in the discretion of the trustee to call for further evidence if he thought proper; and if the trustee has not exercised a sound discretion, the Court before which an appeal comes may correct the error.

In this case, the oath and the vouchers produced would have been sufficient, but for the technical objection to the stamp. At the time this claim was rejected, the trustee had no reason to doubt that it was a good claim, and he has so stated. He had the bankrupts' books, and also a state of their affairs in his possession, which last he considered so accurate as to supersede his making out another; in both of them the sums claimed were entered as due by the bankrupts. It was in these circumstances that the trustee at once, and without calling for further evidence, rejected the claim. I do not think that this was a reasonable proceeding. On the contrary, I am of opinion that it was eminently a case in which the trustee—before disposing of the claim—ought, in the exercise of the powers conferred upon him under sect. 104, to have called upon, and allowed the creditor to produce any farther evidence he had in support of it. And the trustee having been in error in failing to do so, I hold that the Sheriff-substitute did right in correcting the error, by permitting the production of further evidence.

LORD COWAN.—I am of the same opinion.

The power given to the trustee of calling for further evidence in support of a

¹ Stephen v. M'Cubbin, 9th July 1856, ante, vol. xviii. p. 1224.

² Stat. 2 & 3 Vict. c. 41, sects. 11, 102, 104, Wright v. Corrie, 19th Nov. 1842, ante, vol. v. p. 164; Ker v. M'Ewan, 8th Feb. 1845, ante, vol. vii. p. 400; Forbes v. Manson, 2d July 1851 (Lord Fullerton's op.) ante, vol. xiii. p. 1272.

³ Balderston v. Richardson, 20th Feb. 1841, ante, vol. iii. p. 597.

⁴ Stat. 16 & 17 Vict. c. 53, sect. 17.

⁵ Douglas and Co. v. Sanderson, 29th Feb. 1848, ante, vol. x. p. 819.

claim, or at once rejecting it, is conferred by sect. 104, and his exercise of his discretion as to calling for evidence, is as much subject to review as his judgment admitting or rejecting a claim; and I consider that it was just in such a case as this that the trustee ought to have exercised the discretionary power of calling for further evidence. His refusal to do so was open to review. And I do not think there is any thing in the objection that the deliverance is not specially appealed against. It is not at all necessary for a party who brings up for review the final deliverance to appeal specially against an interlocutory order, in order to make it likewise subject to review. It is only one of the steps of the procedure issuing in the final judgment against which the appeal is taken. I say nothing as to the effect of the documents themselves, but I think the Sheriff rightly asked for farther evidence of the alleged loan; and when the bankrupt's books are compared with the notes, there is really no discrepancy between them.

No. 203.

June 30, 1857.

Pilling v.
Drake.

LORD MURRAY.—I agree with your Lordships. This case does not seem to me to be attended with any difficulty. This seems to be a true debt; and as there was plenty proof of its verity in the hands of the trustee, I think it was his duty, in the administration of his office of trustee, to have done justice to the respondent by ranking him for his claim. I am of opinion that the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute was right, and in a case of such perverse litigation, I have no hesitation in finding the appellant liable in expenses.

As to the item of L.60, it was also pleaded;—That the entries in the bankrupt's books being different from the date of the promissory-note, the debt was not sufficiently vouched.

It was replied for the claimant, that the discrepancy in dates founded on was a mere accidental mistake which had occurred in transferring the entry of this loan to the bankrupt's books from the jotting-books. This being explained, the books afforded sufficient evidence of the debt, even without the unstamped promissory-note, which however it was contended that the Court was entitled to look at.

LORD WOOD.—I am of opinion that the documentary evidence sufficiently proves this part of the claim. This sum of L.60, and another of L.106, are contained in two promissory-notes, which are not legal vouchers, not being duly stamped as such. But then both sums are entered in the bankrupt's books as cash borrowed from Drake, and also in the state of his affairs made up by him, which was adopted by the trustee. Now it does not appear to me that there is any such distinction between the sum of L.106—which has been admitted at the bar to be sufficiently vouched—and that of L.60, still disputed, as should lead to the claim for the latter being rejected.

The documents produced—the bank cheque, the bill, and the entry in the bankrupt's books—instruct how the sum of L.60 was advanced by Drake to the bankrupts. They shew the source from which it was supplied, and the way in which it came into their hands. And the discrepancy between the date at which it is entered in the bankrupt's books and the date in the affidavit, and in the promissory-note and claim to which it refers, is truly unimportant. It may be easily accounted for, and is entitled to no weight against the evidence, when fairly dealt with, by which the verity of the claim is supported.

LORD COWAN concurred.

LORD MURRAY.—I will not go into the decision of points not clearly before us here. A bill unstamped, or not properly stamped, is not in the eye of the law a bill or a promissory-note, and is not entitled to any of the privileges of such documents; but are they not good evidence of transactions that have passed between parties? That is a point I should like to be solemnly decided.

Your Lordships think this part of the claim has also been proved, and in that opinion I concur.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK was absent.

THE COURT affirmed the deliverance of the Sheriff-substitute, and found the respondent entitled to the expenses of the appeal.

JOHN WALLS, S.S.C.—WILLIAM STEELE, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 203. held to constitute a promissory-note,¹ and not being written upon a bill or note-stamp of the proper value, could not be received even as evidence, so he had therefore no course open but to reject the claim.² The creditor still had his remedy in getting an equalising payment on establishing the debt, and the rejection of his claim to rank for the first dividend was the appropriate punishment for his neglect to have his claim properly vouched. The documents produced before the Sheriff in support of the claim, were insufficient. The bankrupt's books, the bill, and the excerpts from the books of the bank, did not tally. Moreover, they ought not to be looked at, for the date of the Sheriff's interlocutor allowing them to be produced being within two months of the date of payment of the first dividend, it was incompetent to have produced them to the trustee, and equally so in a question as to ranking for that dividend to produce them to the Sheriff. The interlocutor allowing them to be produced could be reviewed without a special appeal against it, the whole case being brought up by the appeal against his final judgment under the summary mode of procedure provided by the Bankrupt Act.

June 30, 1857.
Pilling v.
Drake.

It was answered for the creditor;—The interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute admitting the vouchers to be produced was final, not having been appealed against.³ The trustee being in possession of the bankrupt's books &c., which sufficiently vouched the debt claimed, it could not be objected that the creditor had failed to produce the vouchers necessary; and supposing these vouchers did not sufficiently prove the claim, it was the duty of the trustee to have called on the creditor to amend his claim.⁴ The claim being to a certain extent vouched by the document produced, and the other evidence being the books in his own hands, the most expedient course would have been for the trustee to have called for further evidence;⁵ and the Sheriff-substitute properly ordered further evidence.

LORD WOOD.—I am of opinion that the Sheriff was right in allowing the production of further evidence. No doubt by sect. 102 the creditor is required to produce the vouchers of his claim along with his affidavit two months before the date at which the dividend is payable. But under the statute it was in the discretion of the trustee to call for further evidence if he thought proper; and if the trustee had not exercised a sound discretion, the Court before which an appeal comes may correct the error.

In this case, the oath and the vouchers produced would have been sufficient but for the technical objection to the stamp. At the time this claim was rejected the trustee had no reason to doubt that it was a good claim, and he has so stated. He had the bankrupts' books, and also a state of their affairs in his possession, which last he considered so accurate as to supersede his making of another; in both of them the sums claimed were entered as due by the bankrupt. It was in these circumstances that the trustee at once, and without calling for further evidence, rejected the claim. I do not think that this was a reasonable proceeding. On the contrary, I am of opinion that it was eminently a case in which the trustee—before disposing of the claim—ought, in the exercise of the powers conferred upon him under sect. 104, to have called upon, and allowed the creditor to produce any farther evidence he had in support of it. And the trustee having been in error in failing to do so, I hold that the Sheriff-substitute did right in correcting the error, by permitting the production of further evidence.

LORD COWAN.—I am of the same opinion.

The power given to the trustee of calling for further evidence in support of

¹ Stephen v. M'Cubbin, 9th July 1856, ante, vol. xviii. p. 1224.

² Stat. 2 & 3 Vict. c. 41, sects. 11, 102, 104, Wright v. Corrie, 19th Nov. 1842, ante, vol. v. p. 164; Ker v. M'Ewan, 8th Feb. 1845, ante, vol. vii. p. 400; Forbes v. Manson, 2d July 1851 (Lord Fullerton's op.) ante, vol. xiii. p. 1272.

³ Balderston v. Richardson, 20th Feb. 1841, ante, vol. iii. p. 597.

⁴ Stat. 16 & 17 Vict. c. 53, sect. 17.

⁵ Douglas and Co. v. Sanderson, 29th Feb. 1848, ante, vol. x. p. 819.

No. 203.

June 30, 1857.

Pilling v.
Drake.

claim, or at once rejecting it, is conferred by sect. 104, and his exercise of his discretion as to calling for evidence, is as much subject to review as his judgment admitting or rejecting a claim; and I consider that it was just in such a case as this that the trustee ought to have exercised the discretionary power of calling for further evidence. His refusal to do so was open to review. And I do not think there is any thing in the objection that the deliverance is not specially appealed against. It is not at all necessary for a party who brings up for review the final deliverance to appeal specially against an interlocutory order, in order to make it likewise subject to review. It is only one of the steps of the procedure issuing in the final judgment against which the appeal is taken. I say nothing as to the effect of the documents themselves, but I think the Sheriff rightly asked for farther evidence of the alleged loan; and when the bankrupt's books are compared with the notes, there is really no discrepancy between them.

LORD MURRAY.—I agree with your Lordships. This case does not seem to me to be attended with any difficulty. This seems to be a true debt; and as there was plenty proof of its verity in the hands of the trustee, I think it was his duty, in the administration of his office of trustee, to have done justice to the respondent by ranking him for his claim. I am of opinion that the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute was right, and in a case of such perverse litigation, I have no hesitation in finding the appellant liable in expenses.

As to the item of L.60, it was also pleaded;—That the entries in the bankrupt's books being different from the date of the promissory-note, the debt was not sufficiently vouched.

It was replied for the claimant, that the discrepancy in dates founded on was a mere accidental mistake which had occurred in transferring the entry of this loan to the bankrupt's books from the jotting-books. This being explained, the books afforded sufficient evidence of the debt, even without the unstamped promissory-note, which however it was contended that the Court was entitled to look at.

LORD WOOD.—I am of opinion that the documentary evidence sufficiently proves this part of the claim. This sum of L.60, and another of L.106, are contained in two promissory-notes, which are not legal vouchers, not being duly stamped as such. But then both sums are entered in the bankrupt's books as cash borrowed from Drake, and also in the state of his affairs made up by him, which was adopted by the trustee. Now it does not appear to me that there is any such distinction between the sum of L.106—which has been admitted at the bar to be sufficiently vouched—and that of L.60, still disputed, as should lead to the claim for the latter being rejected.

The documents produced—the bank cheque, the bill, and the entry in the bankrupt's books—instruct how the sum of L.60 was advanced by Drake to the bankrupts. They shew the source from which it was supplied, and the way in which it came into their hands. And the discrepancy between the date at which it is entered in the bankrupt's books and the date in the affidavit, and in the promissory-note and claim to which it refers, is truly unimportant. It may be easily accounted for, and is entitled to no weight against the evidence, when fairly dealt with, by which the verity of the claim is supported.

LORD COWAN concurred.

LORD MURRAY.—I will not go into the decision of points not clearly before us here. A bill unstamped, or not properly stamped, is not in the eye of the law a bill or a promissory-note, and is not entitled to any of the privileges of such documents; but are they not good evidence of transactions that have passed between parties? That is a point I should like to be solemnly decided.

Your Lordships think this part of the claim has also been proved, and in that opinion I concur.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK was absent.

THE COURT affirmed the deliverance of the Sheriff-substitute, and found the respondent entitled to the expenses of the appeal.

JOHN WALLS, S.S.C.—WILLIAM STEEL, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 204.

July 1, 1857.
Mann v.
Dickson.

ALEXANDER MANN, Appellant.—Penney—Clark.
JAMES ANDERSON DICKSON, Respondent.—Macfarlane—Wood.

Banruptcy—Sequestration—Election of trustee—Corruption.—The party elected to the office of trustee in a sequestration had procured the vote and influence of a creditor by a promise to give him remunerative employment in the course of the sequestration.—Held (abs. Lord Justice-Clerk) that he had been guilty of corruption, in respect of which the election was set aside, and he was declared to be disqualified from again becoming a candidate.

Process—19 & 20 Vict., c. 79 sect. 74.—When the election of a trustee was set aside as illegal, the creditors were appointed to meet to elect a new one, and the meeting to be advertised by the creditors who had objected to the previous election.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Forfarshire.
Bill-Chamber.

AT a meeting of the creditors of Charles Anderson, manufacturer in Arbroath, for the election of a trustee on his sequestrated estate, Alexander Mann and James Anderson Dickson were proposed as candidates. Mann obtained the majority of votes. Dickson lodged a note of objections to the eligibility of Mann, and to the votes given for him, on the ground that he had entered into an agreement or understanding with Thomas Anderson Ogilvy, a partner of the firm of John Ogilvy & Son, who were large creditors, whereby Mann was to give Ogilvy, or the firm of which he was a partner, a share of the profits or commissions of the office of trustee, or grant him some other consideration or appointment under him as trustee, on condition that Ogilvy, who was himself a candidate, should withdraw and give Mann his vote and support, or the vote of his firm in the election of trustee, and use his influence with other creditors to get him elected, in pursuance of which agreement "Ogilvy and the said firm voted for, and used their influence with other creditors to vote for and support Mann, and by means of this support and influence thus illegally and corruptly obtained the said Alexander Mann had a majority in value of the votes of the creditors at the meeting for the election of trustee."

After hearing parties, the Sheriff-substitute (Ramsay Ogilvy) allowed a proof, which was to the following effect:—Dickson, the objector, deponed to having been told by Ogilvy that Mann had promised a consideration to Ogilvy, but if Dickson would give more he would support him.

Ogilvy deponed, that in the event of Mann being elected trustee, he promised to give him (Ogilvy) some employment. His statements were corroborated by Mann, who deponed that Ogilvy at first was a candidate himself, and he, Mann, had agreed to support him, when objection was taken to Ogilvy's youth, &c. He (Ogilvy) then came to Mann, "and said he had not time. He asked me to be candidate, and divide the commission. I was startled with that, knowing it to be illegal, and refused to do so. That was on Saturday. I considered it and took advice of friends. Mr Ogilvy came back on Tuesday. I refused, and said the only thing I could do would be to employ him as servant. He was a former clerk of my own. He was fully conversant with the business, and was interested as largest creditor. I gave him distinctly to understand that any remuneration I could give him must be left entirely to myself. He was to be paid at my discretion for any services he might render. He said he was satisfied, and went away. I agreed to employ him at my own discretion. He had not expressly agreed to vote for me; I understood it as a matter of course he would vote for me."

The Sheriff-substitute pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that, at the meeting held for the election of trustee on the sequestrated estate of Charles Anderson, manufacturer, Arbroath, Alexander Mann and James Anderson Dickson were respectively proposed for the office of trustee: Finds that, upon the vote being taken, creditors having claims to the amount of L.6009, 4s. voted for Mr Mann, and creditors having claims to the amount of L.2179, 17s. 10d. voted for Mr Dickson, and that the preses of the meet- No. 204.

 ing thereafter declared Mr Mann had been elected trustee on the said sequestrated estate; but finds it proved that Mr Mann did, before the day fixed July 1, 1857.
 for the election of a trustee, and when he was himself a candidate for the Mann v.
 office, enter into an arrangement or agreement with Mr Thomas Anderson Dickson.
 Ogilvy, one of the largest creditors on the sequestrated estate, that Mr Ogilvy's services should be made use of by him, if elected, in connection with the future management of the estate, and that the said Thomas Anderson Ogilvy should receive remuneration therefor: Finds that, in reliance upon this agreement, Mr Ogilvy did vote for Mr Mann's election as trustee, and did use his influence in inducing others to vote for him: Finds that the election of the said Alexander Mann has been brought about by illegal means:
 Finds and declares said election to be null and void, and discharges the said Alexander Mann from further proceeding in the execution of said trusteeship, and decerns: Appoints the creditors on the sequestrated estate of the said Charles Anderson to meet to choose a new trustee or trustees in succession, different from the said Alexander Mann, and in his room: Appoints advertisement of the time and place of holding the said meeting to be made in the Gazette by the said James Anderson Dickson: Finds the said Alexander Mann liable in expenses to the objector; allows an account," &c. *

Mann appealed, and pleaded; — (1.) There were no grounds for holding the election void. The objection urged was not statutory, neither was it good at common law. There was nothing fraudulent in promising to employ Ogilvy. The trustee was entitled to assistance, and he had not promised to overpay Ogilvy. On the contrary, he had carefully reserved to himself the determination of the amount of his remuneration. The judgment appealed against was entirely without authority. The case of M'Gowan did not apply. There it was not only alleged that a share of the profits had been promised, but also that the trustee had seriously mismanaged the estate. (2.) The case of M'Gowan still less justified the interlocutor, in so far as it declared the appellant ineligible for re-election. The judgment

* "NOTE.—It was candidly admitted by Mr Mann, in his examination, that he had given a pledge to Mr Ogilvy, before the election, that he would employ him in connection with the management of the estate, and that he expected Mr Ogilvy to vote for him; and it further clearly appeared from Mr Ogilvy's evidence, that it was in consequence of, and in reliance upon this pledge, that he did vote for Mr Mann, and did induce other creditors to a very considerable amount to vote in the same way. Mr Mann may not have had any corrupt motive in making this pledge; but the Sheriff-substitute cannot countenance any proceedings of this kind.
 It would be injurious to the interests of the general body of the creditors, and is directly contrary to the principle of law in relation to such matters as laid down in the case of M'Gowan, 13th December 1808, and numerous subsequent cases.

"The only difficulty the Sheriff-substitute had was as to the course of the future procedure in the sequestration. There does not appear in the Act to be any express power given to order a meeting for a new election of a trustee in circumstances like the present; and as the case was a novel one, and of some importance in the construction of the New Bankrupt Statute, the Sheriff-substitute took the opinion of the Sheriff-principal. In conformity with the views indicated by the Sheriff, and with the practice of the Court of Session under the old statute of 54 Geo. III. c. 37, as indicated in the case of Cheyne v. Guthrie, 3d July 1828; Railton v. M'Laren, 8th July 1835; and A. B. v. Berry, 10th June 1837, and also being anxious to construe the statute beneficially for the interest of the estate, the Sheriff-substitute has decided that he may order a meeting to be held for the election of a new trustee. He has accordingly appointed the creditor-objector, who has appeared, to intimate it in the Gazette, which is the course directed by the statute to be taken in certain analogous cases."

No. 204. seemed to be founded on some supposed analogy between the law of bankruptcy and parliamentary law, but none such existed. A special statute was necessary to disqualify a bribing candidate for a seat in Parliament, and there was no such provision in any of the bankrupt Acts.¹
 July 1, 1857.
 Mann v.
 Dickson.

LORD WOOD.—The objection to the election of the appellant as trustee under this sequestration is founded on the bargain made by him with Ogilvy, or the understanding which was established between them, and the case is now before us on two questions—1st, Whether or not what took place is only to have the effect of vitiating the election; and, 2d, Whether the appellant is also thereby incapacitated from being re-elected.

I think that where such practices as are alleged have been resorted to, in order to influence the vote of a creditor, and to induce him to solicit and influence the votes of other creditors, it is perfectly competent to bring forward the objection in a note of objections lodged to the election of the trustee,

Then, as to the proof, it is impossible, I apprehend, to read the evidence taken before the Sheriff-substitute without being satisfied that the use of corrupt practices is fully established.

Then, as regards the law, we have the authority of Mr Bell that any such bargain or arrangement as was here entered into is sufficient to vitiate a party's election as trustee. It was indeed urged that all that passed was merely a bargain for services to be performed. But it is manifest that the promise which was made may have the effect of unduly influencing a creditor's vote, and inducing him to be active in obtaining the votes of others as much as the handing over to him a sum of money. It is just a prospective promise or consideration for a prospective vote. I think it indisputable that the appellant procured his election by illegal means.

The case of M'Gowan may not be exactly parallel in its circumstances; but the legal principle which the decision involves, and on which it proceeds, is of clear application to the present case, which is—that corrupt practices by an individual in promoting his election as trustee vitiates the election.

Farther, and upon the remaining question,—whether the consequence is merely the annulling the particular election, or extends to the disqualification of the individual as a candidate for the trusteeship in that sequestration—I think that that point is also ruled against the appellant by the decision in the case of M'Gowan. When a party has once used such practices, there is no security that he will not do so again; and it is impossible to say how far the persons on whom the illegal influences applied to them had operated in inducing their votes at the one election might continue to be operated on, and induced again to vote for the party who had resorted to them. I am clearly of opinion that the sound result in point of law is, that not only is the election in question bad, but that the appellant is also disqualified from being re-elected.

LORD COWAN.—If necessary, I would be prepared to concur in Lord Wood's view, and to hold that by the promise made by the appellant, a party might be as much influenced as by handing to him a sum of money. But the case is not that the party was to be employed to do what the trustee could not do in the conduct of the business of the sequestration. It is, that he was to be employed by the trustee to do part of what fell within his proper duty,—it may be as his clerk or servant. This, as it appears to me, is just a fraudulent device for doing covertly what the parties could not do openly, viz., dividing the commission, which it is proved by the terms of Ogilvy's deposition, as well as of Mann's, was spoken of and known by them both to be illegal. The view I take is simply this, that it was a covert attempt on the part of Mann to procure Ogilvy's support by a promise to give him a part of the profits. We cannot, consistently with principle, and with the decided cases, sanction this, or hold it other than an illegal paction, vitiating the election of the party who entered into it.

On the second point, there may be a little more delicacy, but on that point I am of the same opinion as Lord Wood. It is in vain to say that there may be a second election with none of the objectionable procedure which has vitiated the first. It has not been shewn that any case has occurred where an election has been held to be vitiated on the grounds we proceed on, and in which a new election has been ordered, without the recognition by the Court, either in the judgment or in the opinions of the Judges, that the party whose election has been set aside is barred from being again elected. In the case of Railton, 8th July 1835, Lord Gillies says—"Now that it is known,"—the case referred to was the use of bribery by a candidate for the office of trustee in a sequestration,—“the question is, what is to be the effect of it? I think it disqualifies him for the office of trustee in this sequestration.” Were it otherwise, the beneficial effect of the recognition by the Court of the principle on which the original election has been set aside would be frustrated. Nothing would be easier than to go through the form of a second election, avoiding all ostensible tampering with votes, already secured by means of that illegal procedure, the proof of which has proved fatal to the first.

¹ The respondents cited II. Bell's Com., p. 371

LORD MURRAY concurred.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK absent.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal, and found the respondent entitled to expenses.

GRAHAM BINNY, W.S.—WEBSTER & RENNY, W.S.—Agents.

PATRICK MAITLAND, Pursuer.—M. Napier—Patton.

JOHN M'CLELLAND, Defender.—G. G. Bell—Park.

No. 205.

Process—Res noviter.—There is no abstract rule that a deed or instrument recorded in the public records, can in no case be founded on as res noviter veniens ad notitiam. Circumstances in which (alt. judgment of Lord Handyside, abs. Lord Ivory) facts appearing from such a deed were allowed to be added to the record.

PATRICK MAITLAND of Freugh claimed a Crown grant of the oyster fishings in the Bay of Luce, adjacent to his lands; and he presented a petition to the Sheriff of Wigtounshire for interdict against John M'Lelland, a fisherman, interfering with his right.

July 2, 1857.
—
1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Handyside
L.

The respondent pleaded, that the titles produced by the complainer did not confer an exclusive right of fishing; and, at any rate, that the right did not extend to that part of the Bay of Luce in which the respondent had been in use to fish. The record was closed in 1853. The Sheriff dismissed the petition as incompetent. The pursuer brought the case by advocacy before the Inner-House; and the Court, before answer, allowed him to bring a declarator of the alleged right. That action was brought in November 1854. The pursuer founded upon a charter of novodamus under the Great Seal of Scotland, dated 5th March 1707, and progress of titles down to his own investiture in 1823. He averred that he and his ancestors were feudally vested, inter alias, in the lands of Killiness, with the oyster fishings adjacent; and he averred a special service, inter alias, in said lands, expedite in favour of himself as heir of his father, and the foundation of his title of 1823.

The defender stated that the writing of 1707 was an extract from the Register of the Great Seal, and proceeded on a resignation by M'Dowall of Freugh; but that, among the lands and heritages resigned, there were no sea fishings, nor was any sasine ever taken upon the alleged charter.

The record was closed in June 1855, and the Lord Ordinary made avizandum to the Inner-House ob contingentiam of the advocacy. The two processes were then conjoined and remitted to the Lord Ordinary, and now came before the Court on a reclaiming note by the defender against an interlocutor by his Lordship, refusing to allow the record to be opened up, in order that there should be added to it, as res noviter, the following averments:—(After stating the facts above narrated, and also that by the misrepresentations of the pursuer, the defender believed, that although the dominium utile of the lands of Killiness had come to belong to others, the dominium directum had remained in the pursuer's predecessors, and had passed to him)—“9. That in this state of knowledge, on the part of the

No. 205.
 —
 July 2, 1857.
 Maitland v.
 M'Clelland.

defender and pursuer, respectively, the record in the present cause was closed by interlocutor on 6th June 1855, and the cause debated, in the ordinary course of the roll. That while the cause stood for debate, the Lord Advocate appeared in it, and, on 28th November 1855, sisted himself and the Commissioners of Woods and Forests on behalf of the Crown, but without lodging any written pleading, or disclosing in any point the facts or pleas on which he meant to rely. That the said Crown officers afterwards, by summons of declarator, signeted 25th February 1856, raised a separate and independent action against the said Patrick Maitland, pursuer in the present action, against the defender, concluding that he had no right of oyster fishings in the Bay of Luce, except in such part as is ex adverso of, or adjacent to, lands now his property, or which were the property of Patrick M'Dowall of Freugh, at the date of the alleged Crown charter of 1707: And in the condescendence annexed to this summons, the Crown officers set forth inter alia the facts which are contained in the defender's condescendence of res noviter. 10. That on seeing the said condescendence attached to the summons for the Crown, the defender John M'Clelland, and those acting for him, for the first time became aware or had any suspicion of the facts stated in the condescendence of res noviter, or of the subject-matter thereof; and they are still uninformed of the way in which the Crown became acquainted with said facts. 11. That said facts are, in substance, that the lands of Killiness (which, of those mentioned in the writings founded on by the pursuer, are the only lands adjoining the sea in the district of the defender's fishing operations) did not at the date of the signature or alleged charter of 1707 belong to M'Dowall of Freugh, in any respect, having ceased to belong to his predecessors as far back as 1643, and being exclusively vested, both in property and superiority, by singular titles, in the Adairs of Kinbilt; and having passed from them and their creditor to Lord Stair, and now remaining and being vested in his present heir or successor." He also proposed to add the following plea in law:—"The intention in the signature or alleged charter of 1707 having been to confer the right of fishing only in water adjacent to the lands belonging to the grantee, the inadvertency or error of including in the alleged grant of novodamus the foresaid lands of Caliness, or Killiness, as belonging to the grantee, when they had long ceased to belong to him or his predecessors, and when they truly belonged exclusively to others, could give no right to fishing in water adjacent to these lands."

The pursuer objected to the defender's motion, on the ground that the alleged facts appeared on the face of the public records, and were all along perfectly accessible to the defender and his advisers.

The Lord Ordinary, on 21st May 1857, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Refuses the motion of the defender that the closed record be opened up, in order that the averments of fact alleged by the defender to be res noviter, may be added to the record." *

* "NOTE.—Assuming the relevancy of the facts alleged to be res noviter, to support certain grounds of defence to the action, though that appears to depend on the meaning to be put on some words in the pursuer's titles, which the parties construe differently, the question for determination is, whether the defender has shown that the facts proposed to be added to the record fall under the class of res noviter, so as to entitle him to have the record opened up? The circumstances under which these facts came to the knowledge of the defender are explained in the minute. The objection of the pursuer is, that the deeds, the contents of which are averred as being res noviter, and which had been discovered by another party on the public records, were equally accessible on the defender's own search, before closing the record, as now. The Lord Ordinary apprehends the objection must receive effect on the authority of the case of Grahame v. Grahame, May 29, 1821, Fac. Coll.: affirmed in the House of Lords, June 14, 1825, 1 Wilson & Shaw, 353. It was there held that deeds which have been recorded (in that case a bond of provision

The defender reclaimed.¹

No. 205.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am not aware of any abstract rule, such as has been assumed by the Lord Ordinary and the pursuer, that where a deed is on record, it cannot be founded on as res noviter. The principle is, that a party is not entitled to found on anything as res noviter, which he either knew, or which by reasonable inquiry he might have known; and therefore every case must be judged of according to its own circumstances. The case of Grahame established no general principle. It was a peculiar case; and its circumstances were not precisely the same with the present, whether we look to the nature of the subject-matter of inquiry, or the particular object for which the deeds are now sought to be founded on. Looking to the record, it appears to me that it is rather ob majorem cautelam, to prevent objections as to surprise, that this statement is sought to be put on record; and in that view I think that the case of Grahame does not apply, and that the defender may be allowed to make this addition to the record.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—I am of the same opinion. There is no abstract rule, that a matter discoverable by any possible search is not res noviter. Every case depends upon its own circumstances; and the sole question here is, whether by proper diligence this party could have discovered the documents or facts which he now wishes to introduce into the case. The circumstance of the documents being in a record, the very object of which is publication, is certainly always a very material consideration in a question of this sort. But it may be that the record does not contain full information, or from the change of names or otherwise in the transmission of property may mislead. According to the statement laid before us here, this property has been in name of the pursuer for a hundred years. Was the defender guilty of negligence in not making inquiry into the records for two hundred years back, in order to test the accuracy of the pursuer's statements and the validity of his titles? I think he was not; and therefore I concur.

LORD DEAS.—I concur. I do not think it can be laid down that a deed or instrument recorded in the public records can, in no case, be allowed to be founded on as res noviter veniens ad notitiam. In the case of Grahame, the deeds proposed to be founded on were deeds by or in favour of the party's own ancestor, and may have been regarded as traceable in the family repositories. At all events the case of Grahame did not affirm, as an absolute and inflexible rule, the broad general principle now contended for. Here, the defender is a common fisherman, exercising his right, as one of the public, of dredging for oysters in the sea. He is sought to be interdicted and stopped by the pursuer in virtue of an alleged exclusive right, which can only be constituted by Crown grant. But was the defender bound to know every step in the progress of Crown titles which might be found in the public records,—obscure or not obscure as regarded applicability to particular localities,—from the earliest times downwards? I do not think that would be reasonable. Looking to what the titles in dispute are, and to the circumstances, I think the averments may be competently added as res noviter, although I do not know that they are very necessary to the purpose in view.

LORD IVORY absent.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall the said interlocutor reclaimed against; and remit to the Lord Ordinary to grant the motion of the defender, that the closed record be opened up, in order that the averments of fact alleged by the defender to be res noviter may be added to the record: Further, of consent of parties given at the bar, they find that the remit before made shall be and discharge) could not be received after judgment on the ground of falling under noviter veniens ad notitiam. Thus a construction appears to have been given to noviter veniens, as exclusive in all cases of deeds accessible to the knowledge of parties by being registered in the public records. And that being so, it seems to the Lord Ordinary that the provision of the statute 6 Geo. IV. c. 120, in regard to the competency of either party, after closing the record, stating matter of fact noviter veniens, is to be subject to the application of the same principle."

¹ Mailler v. Hunter, 25th Nov. 1852, ante, vol. xv. p. 88.

No. 205.

July 2, 1857.
M'Vicar v.
Kerr.

carried into effect in this cause without payment of any expenses by the defender, in consequence of his making such additions to his record; and, on the other hand, that the defender shall not be entitled to any expenses in relation to the discussion of his motion to have the record opened up, in which he has now been successful."

A. SMITH, S.S.C.—R. M'WILLIAM, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 206.

DONALD M'VICAR, Suspender.—Fraser.
ANDREW KERR, Respondent.—Logan—A. Mure.

Diligence—Poinding of moveables—1 & 2 Vict c. 114—Suspension.—A warrant of sale of poinded effects suspended (alt. judgment of Lord Mackenzie, abs. Lord Justice-Clerk) on the ground that the warrant of sale did not specify the place where the goods were to be sold.

July 2, 1857.

2^d DIVISION.
Ld Mackenzie.
Bill-Chamber.
R.

KERR obtained a decree against M'Vicar before the Sheriff-court of Argyleshire. M'Vicar was charged thereon, and afterwards an officer was employed to poind his effects. The poinding was reported, and a warrant granted by the Sheriff to sell on the 19th April 1857, which was a Sunday. A suspension was applied for, and the warrant was abandoned. A new warrant of sale was granted in these terms:—"Inverary, 18th April 1857.—Having considered the foregoing execution and report of poinding, Grants warrant to the poinding creditor, at sight of David Crombie, auctioneer, Inverary, judge hereby appointed, to sell by public roup the subjects mentioned in the said execution, upon Tuesday the 28th day of April current, at 10 o'clock forenoon, exposing the same at upset prices not less than their appraised values: Appoints the roup to be advertised at the church door of the parish within which the place of sale is situated, and at other public places, not later than eight days before the day of sale, and otherwise, in terms of the statute: Further, Appoints a copy of this warrant to be served on the debtor, and on the possessor of the poinded goods, if these are different parties, at least six days before the date of sale, and appoints the sale to be reported within eight days after it takes place. — J. MACLACHLIN, S. S."

A note of suspension and interdict was presented, and interim interdict granted. The following are the objections to the proceedings which were urged, viz.—That more than year and day had elapsed after the date of the charge before the poinding; that a portion of the poinded effects were in the possession of a Mrs Carmichael; that no schedule of poinding had been left with her; and that the warrant of sale did not specify the place where the sale was to take place.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"In respect the charger has judicially abandoned his right to proceed with the poinding and sale so far as regards the effects in the hands of Mrs Carmichael, and in respect the diligence appears to be regular so far as regards the other effects specified in the execution of poinding, Refuses the note: Recalls the interim interdict: Finds the complainer liable in expenses, subject to modification: Allows an account," &c. *

* "NOTE.—The interim interdict granted under the first suspension applied only to the first warrant of sale, which was abandoned. An execution has been produced that due intimation of the sale under the second warrant was made to the complainer.

"It has been decided that a poinding is competent after the lapse of a year and day from the date of the charge, without any new charge.—Kerr, 30th May 1857, 15 Shaw, 1041.

"Though the form of the warrant of sale is perhaps not so precise as it ought

M·Vicar reclaimed. The warrant of sale was supported on the ground of its being clear that the sale was to take place where the pointed effects were situated, so that no further specification of the place of sale was necessary. No. 206.
July 3, 1857.
Ritchie v.
Dickson.

LORD WOOD.—The Sheriff is directed by the statute to order a number of matters, so as to be most for the benefit of all parties interested. I think it is a statutory requisite that a warrant of sale shall mention not only the time, but also the place at which the sale is to take place. We must pass the bill.

LORD COWAN.—I think this note should be passed, upon the ground that the warrant of sale is defective, in so far as it does not set forth the place of sale. I do not express any opinion on the other grounds. The mention of a place of sale is a statutory requisite, the want of which, it appears to me, cannot be dispensed with.

LORD MURRAY concurred.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK absent.

THE COURT passed the note.

WOTHERSPOON & MACK, W.S.—JOHN ROBERTSON, S.S.C.—Agents.

DAVID RITCHIE, Pursuer, Advocate.—Macfarlane—Gifford.
JAMES DICKSON, Defender, Respondent.—Penney—Fraser.

No. 207.

Lease—Construction—Removing—Proof.—A tenant pursued a removing against a sub-tenant, who averred that he was tenant under the pursuer's landlord. The pursuer produced his lease, which excepted from the subjects let to the pursuer "the houses presently possessed by the said defender." Held, that the terms of the lease did not exclude the pursuer from proving that the defender was his sub-tenant, and that the exceptions in the lease related only to other subjects occupied by the defender.

DAVID RITCHIE, tenant of the farm of Mains of Huntingtower under a July 3, 1857. nineteen years lease from Martinmas 1845 from the trustees of General Cunningham of Newton, presented a summary application to the Sheriff of Perthshire, praying for a warrant to remove James Dickson from a cottage and plot of ground adjacent to the petitioner's dwelling-house at Huntingtower, which, it was alleged, Dickson had been sub-tenant of under the petitioner, on verbal let or tacit relocation, from the date of the petitioner's entry up to the term of Martinmas 1855; and that, more than forty days previous to that term, he had been warned to remove, but had refused to do so. The respondent entered appearance. There were produced — 1st, a tack in favour of James Ritchie, the petitioner's brother and immediate predecessor as tenant of the Mains of Huntingtower, by which there was reserved from the subjects let "the house and garden let to Dickson, baker;" 2d, the lease in favour of the petitioner, from which there were reserved from the subjects let "the whole houses, gardens, and grounds now occupied by James Dickson;" and, 3d, proceedings in a reference entered into between General Cunningham's trustees and the petitioner, in which it was decided that the cottage, &c. in question had been let by the trustees to the petitioner, and that he was entitled to the rents thereof. 2^D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Perth.
R.

At the diet of compearance, the Sheriff noted the following defence: — "Denied that the cottage and garden in question are let to the petitioner by the lease founded on; but it expressly excludes them, which were then occupied by the defender, and denied that the defender is his sub-tenant. The defender is principal tenant under Major-General Cunningham's trus-o have been, the Lord Ordinary, as at present advised, does not think the objections urged by the complainer are sufficient to warrant him in passing the note."

No. 207.
 —
 July 3, 1857.
 Ritchie v.
 Dickson.

tees. The alleged knowledge and acceptance thereof is denied. With reference to the petitioner's productions, the defender denies—1st. That he is or ever was a party to any reference with the pursuer. 2d. He denies that the alleged reference is valid and subsisting; and 3d. He denies that it embraces the question raised in the present process." The pursuer's denial of this statement was minuted, whereupon the record was closed.

After hearing parties, the Sheriff-substitute pronounced this interlocutor:—"In respect that at the debate parties were not agreed as to the state and title of possession at the time of the lease by the said trustees to the pursuer, and that the correct ascertainment of the relative facts appeared necessary to the right understanding of the extent of the subjects let, and exemptions therefrom—Appoints the pursuer to lodge a condescendence of his averments, . . and the defender to lodge defences."

The pursuer lodged a condescendence, in which were narrated the leases to the pursuer and his predecessor. It was alleged that there were, on the lands belonging to Cunningham's trustees, a variety of buildings, and among others, a row of eight cottages, of which the cottage in question was the sixth, counting from the west. Some of these cottages were let by Cunningham's trustees directly to the defender; others of them, including the cottage in question, were embraced in the lease to the pursuer. The defender, besides the cottages which he held directly from the landlord, had also become sub-tenant under the pursuer's predecessor, of the cottage No. 6, and of certain other subjects. In this way the defender held some cottages as tenant of Cunningham's trustees, and others as sub-tenant under the pursuer's predecessor.

When a new lease came to be granted to the pursuer by Cunningham's trustees, there was excepted the houses "presently occupied by James Dickson" (the defender.) This only meant, however, the houses which James Dickson held directly from Cunningham's trustees, and had no reference to those of which James Dickson was a mere sub-tenant under the former.

The pursuer farther stated that a submission had been entered into between him and Cunningham's trustees (the landlords), in which it was finally found that the cottage in question, No. 6, was included in the pursuer's lease, and was not reserved therefrom. It was farther averred that the defender had recognised the principal tenant as his landlord, and actually paid him rent for the cottage No. 6.

These averments were denied by the defender, who stated (1st.) That the pursuer's lease excepted from the subjects let to him "the whole houses" &c. then "occupied" by the defender; and (2d.) That at the date of the pursuer's lease, and at the term of his entry, the defender "occupied" the cottage and garden in question.

The record was closed on these papers; and the Sheriff allowed the defender a proof of his second averment. The pursuer put on record a minute, admitting that averment under reference to his own statement.

Having heard parties, the Sheriff-substitute (Barclay) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds it not alleged that the defender has any lease direct from the pursuer, and it is not proved that the defender recognised the pursuer as his landlord in the cottage from which he is now sought to be ejected: Finds that the pursuer's title to sue is founded on the lease, No. 7 of process, whereby there is let to him, by the trustees of the deceased Major-General John Cunningham, 'All and Whole the farm of Mains of Huntingtower,' and amongst other reservations there is reserved 'the castle and whole houses, gardens, and grounds then in the occupancy of James Dickson:' Finds it admitted that the defender, at the time of the said lease, was in the occupancy of the said cottage, and therefore that the same fell within the reservation or exception from the subjects leased: No. 207.

 Finds that the import of the said clause, so plain in itself, and wherein there exists no patent or latent ambiguity, cannot be controlled, nor its operation extended nor limited by extrinsic evidence, especially by writings and transactions to which the defender was no party: Therefore finds the pursuer has no title to sue this removing, assoilzies the defender from the action: Finds the defender entitled to expenses: Remits," &c.*

July 3, 1857.
 Ritchie v.
 Dickson.

The pursuer appealed. After considering a reclaiming petition and answers, the Sheriff (Mure) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Alters the interlocutor appealed from, in so far as it 'assoilzies the defender from the action:' Dismisses the said action, and, with this variation, affirms the interlocutor submitted to review, and decerns." †

* "NOTE.—Were it not for the rigid and well-founded rule of law that a concluded agreement reduced to writing cannot be extended or limited by extrinsic evidence, even by preliminary writings passing directly between the parties themselves, but preliminary to the final completion of the contract, there do exist no trivial grounds for holding that the cottage in question was really not intended by the parties to the lease to fall within the exception; but the question is not one of intention, but of completed fact, and if there be meaning in language, there was not leased to the pursuer any houses which were at the time of the lease in the occupancy of the defender. The cottage in question was so occupied, and therefore excepted from the lease; it could never be allowed to the Court to introduce the words 'so far only as the same are held by him under lease from us.' That would be to make a new bargain for the parties, which no court of law can or ought to do. Courts are set up to enforce contracts, not to make them, and have to decide on what parties have actually done, not on what they might, could, would, or should have done.

"The question at issue is not, as ably urged by the pursuer's procurator, what title the defender has to hold the property as against Cunningham's trustees, or what title the trustees have to sue such action. The sole question is, what is the pursuer's title to sue this removing and oust the defender. A man may justly owe a debt, but none can claim or sue for it except the proper creditor. The popular action is unknown in our law, nor even in such an action as this was it known in Roman law. There is no class of actions where the instance is more special than in that of removing. The party must shew in the words of style that the occupant must remove and leave the subjects void 'that the pursuer may enter therein.' "

† "NOTE.—Were the condition of the argument that assumed in the reclaiming petition, viz., of a defender standing on a plea of want of title of a very technical description, without asserting any right to hold as against either the pursuer or the proprietors of the subject in dispute, the Sheriff might, in the circumstances, and having regard to what has passed between the pursuer and the proprietors, have inclined to repel such a plea. That, however, is not the condition of the argument. For the defender not only objects to the pursuer's title to sue the action on the ground that the subjects in question are expressly excluded from the lease libelled on, but asserts a right to hold possession as against the proprietors, and founds upon a lease granted to him in 1854, under which, he says, he is entitled to maintain possession during the whole currency of his lease, and in respect of the rent therein stipulated. In these circumstances, and the action being rested on the lease, No. 7 of process, as the title to eject, the question comes to be, whether that lease can be held to give the pursuer a title to demand immediate possession of the subjects and eject the defender. The Sheriff is humbly of opinion that it cannot. He concurs with the Sheriff-substitute in thinking, now that it is admitted that the defender was, at the date of the pursuer's lease in 1845, in the occupancy of the subjects in dispute, that under the words 'whole houses, gardens, and grounds now occupied by James Dickson,' the said subjects must, ex facie of the pursuer's lease, be dealt with as excepted therefrom, and that it is not competent, at all events in this summary action of removing, to control or qualify those words by extrinsic evidence, and especially not by the terms of a decree-arbitral in a submission to which the defender was no

No. 207.

July 3, 1857.
Ritchie v.
Dickson.

The pursuer advocated, and the Lord Ordinary made avizandum to the Court.

The advocator pleaded;—The cottage in question having been found by the arbiter to be part of the subjects let to the advocator, the respondent was bound to pay to the advocator the rent of it, as much as if the terms of the lease had been determined by a declaratory action. Besides, there was no proper averment that the respondent held in tack from General Cunningham's trustees, nor did he even produce any receipts for the rents from them for the years since 1845. The pursuer alleged in his petition that he had a lease of the subjects in question, and his allegations were made more full in his subsequent condescendence on that point, on which a record was closed. There being evidence on record that the defender was the subtenant of the pursuer, he could not object to the title of his author. At any rate, the pursuer may still prove his title, which it is quite competent for the pursuer in a removing to make up in the course of the process.¹

The respondent pleaded;—The first question to be disposed of was the title of the advocator. Though the respondent did not aver that he had any lease, he averred that he was in the occupation of these premises at the date of the advocator's lease, which, being admitted, clearly excepted them from the subjects let to the advocator. The respondent, being a tenant of various subjects under the pursuer's landlord, had no special receipts for the rent of the cottage in question, which was of trifling value only, being stated by the pursuer at L.2, 10s. per annum. The Sheriff-substitute, rightly holding the decision of the cause to depend upon the construction of the advocator's lease, in which the description of the subjects excepted was referred to the occupation of some of them by the respondent at the date of the lease, allowed the respondent a proof of his averment to that effect, and a conjunct proof to the advocator, under which the advocator might have proved, if he could, that the averment was false; but instead of this, it was admitted to be true, which clearly excluded the advocator's title.

LORD WOOD.—I confess I have some hesitation in dissenting from interlocutors pronounced by the learned Sheriff-substitute and Sheriff of Perthshire, particularly in a question of removing, with cases of which description they must have so frequently to deal; but I venture to think it probable that the point chiefly pressed upon us, on the part of the pursuer, had not been prominently insisted on in the inferior Court.

The action is a summary one of removing, brought in January 1856, by petition at the instance of the complainer against the respondent, the defender in the action to have him ordained instantly to remove from the cottage, No. 6 on the plan produced, and the defence primarily and properly so raised, if meant to be insisted on is to the title of the pursuer.

The pursuer's title is a lease from the proprietors of Huntingtower, dated 1 June 1846, by which he says the cottage No. 6 is let by them to the pursuer, for the preceding term of Martinmas, and which cottage he alleges the defender occupies as his subtenant. The defender, in defence, avers that the cottage is not party, and which was pronounced not only after the raising of the present action but after the record had been closed as between the pursuer and defender. The Sheriff had at first some doubt whether the defender's averment as to his right to hold possession against the proprietors was sufficiently distinct, for those in the paper No. 23 of process are certainly vague in this as well as other respects. But the averment is explicit in the short record as originally made up and closed, and must, it is thought, still be dealt with as the statutory record. The sheriff delayed advising this case sooner, as the parties seemed to wish an inspection, which he was unable to overtake until the sittings held at Perth last week; and as the action has been disposed of on a plea of want of title, he has thought it better simply to dismiss it instead of assailing the defender."

¹ Mackintosh v. Munro, 23d November 1854, ante, vol. xvii. p. 99.

tained in the pursuer's lease, and that he does not occupy it as his subtenant; but at the same time not averring on the record (that is, on what I hold to be the record, viz. the one closed on the 21st March 1856), specifically any title from any other party.

No. 207.

July 3, 1857.
Ritchie v.
Dickson.

In support of this defence, the defender refers to the terms of the pursuer's lease, and particularly to an express reservation from it, by which there is reserved "the castle, and whole houses, gardens, and grounds, now occupied by James Dickson," that is, the defender.

Now, it is admitted that at the date of this lease the defender was in the occupation of the cottage in question, which superseded any necessity of proof by the defender of his second counter averment, in his answers to the pursuer's condescendence, as allowed by interlocutor of 21st March 1856.

The defender therefore contended, that by the admitted state of the fact, and the express terms of the reservation in the pursuer's lease, as applied to it, the cottage in question is excluded from the lease.

Now, there are no doubt many cases in which the defender in a removing may competently object to the sufficiency of the pursuer's title; and it may be so, even where the defender neither exhibits nor alleges any competing title of possession. But it is a well established rule, that generally the defender cannot impugn the pursuer's title, if his own right of possession flows from the pursuer; if, for instance, the defender is the pursuer's subtenant. And for a very obvious reason, viz. that he cannot challenge or impeach the validity of a title on which his own right depends, and the sufficiency of which, at least to give possession to himself, he has in truth acknowledged.

If, then, the fact was that the defender was the pursuer's subtenant, he could not object to the pursuer's title to remove him from the cottage No. 6. And if so, and the subtenancy is sufficiently averred by the pursuer, but not admitted, then the fact averred ought to be investigated before the question of title is disposed of.

Then, is the subtenancy so averred? Without detaining your Lordship by reading them, I shall only refer to the statement in articles 14 and 15 of the pursuer's condescendence. No doubt the statements contained in them are denied. But I think the averment is well made; and that being the case, the parties are at issue upon a fact relevant to the matter of the sufficiency of the pursuer's title, as in a question with the defender, and his right to object to it.

Looking to the statements in the record, and the documents produced, it appears to me to be difficult to say that the cottage No. 6 must be held to be positively excluded from the pursuer's lease of 1846; that any opposite view is absolutely inadmissible. I think there is at least enough to show that there was room for the pursuer's dealing with it as not excluding the cottage No. 6; and the point is, did he do so? And did the defender deal with him as having a right to sublet to him the cottage No. 6? If the defender did so, I apprehend that, in a question with the defender, it is no answer on the defender's part to say, as was suggested, you had no valid right by your lease to the cottage No. 6; and if you had no right, then the cottage must have been possessed by me under the proprietor; for in that case it was on his right that my right to possess could alone be founded.

It may be that, in a question with the proprietor, the pursuer's alleged title might be a bad title to the cottage No. 6, and that, in a question between the proprietor and the defender, it might resolve into this, that the defender had no title of possession, either from the pursuer or from the proprietor, that he was a possessor sine titulo. But the question here is, not with the proprietors, but with the pursuer, as principal tacksman, and upon his averment of subtenancy as made. His title, although it might prove to be bad against the proprietors, is the only title to which he can ascribe his possession, and which he cannot repudiate, however bad that title might prove to be as against the proprietor.

Accordingly, take the case that a written sublease from the pursuer were produced, how could the defender be heard to impugn the pursuer's title under the lease 1846, to sue a removing against him? How could it, then, be sustained as a relevant and good answer, that the pursuer's lease, according to its true construction and effect, does not give him the cottage in dispute? And therefore, the defender's possession must be as tenant under the proprietors, and not as sub-

No. 207.
 —
 July 3, 1857.
 Ritchie v.
 Dickson.

tenant under the pursuers. I am certain that such a plea would fall to be repelled. And if so, I am not aware on what ground it can be otherwise dealt with when the averment is a subtenancy by verbal lease. I see no room for a distinction. A subtenancy may be as effectually constituted for a limited period by a verbal lease as one for a longer period by a written lease; and I am of opinion that the averment of such subtenancy is in the present case just as relevant as would be the averment of a subtenancy by written lease.

I do not all found upon the submission between the pursuer and the proprietor Cunningham's trustees, and the averment in it as a fortification or clearing of the pursuer's title. It may be that the defender can justly maintain that his rights can in no shape be affected by it. I assume that to be the case, and take the title of the pursuer as it stands on the terms of his lease. And doing so for the reasons I have stated, I am of opinion that before the validity of the pursuer's title to insist in the removing was disposed of, his averment that the defender, after March 1845 or June 1846, possessed the cothouse No. 6, solely as his subtenant, having retained it after that date by agreement with him, and continued so to do when the removing was brought, but which averment was denied, ought to have been made the subject of proof; and that therefore the interlocutor complained of ought to be recalled, and the case remitted to the Sheriff, in order that the necessary investigation may take place.

LORD COWAN.—To entitle a party to insist in an action of removing, he must have a clear title to the subject from which he seeks to have the possessor or occupier evicted. In this case the title founded on by the pursuer is a lease for nineteen years of the farm on which the cothouse and garden occupied by the defender, as his alleged subtenant, are situated; and assuming that these subjects are within the pursuer's lease from the proprietor, there can be no doubt of the sufficiency of his title to insist in this action.

But, further, it is unquestionable that where the right of the party sought to be evicted by the action of removing has flowed from the pursuer, he will not be listened to in objecting to the title—how objectionable, soever, it may be—in a question with third parties holding some distinct and separate right or title to possess. This is no less true where the action is at the instance of a tenant against a subtenant deriving right from him, than when at the instance of a proprietor against parties to whom he may have let the subjects.

The peculiarity of the present case, in the latter aspect of it, has not, as I think, been sufficiently attended to in the inferior court. The pursuer, founding on his lease from the trustees of General Cunningham in 1845, sets forth that the defender is in possession of a part of the subjects within his lease as his subtenant on a verbal tack from year to year by tacit relocation. And in the supplementary record, the averments to this effect are quite distinct, and very specific. I allude particularly to article 14 and article 17 of the condescendence. Moreover, in the answer to article 14, the defender admits that he was subtenant of the subjects under James Ritchie, the pursuer's predecessor, up till 1845, the date of the new lease from the proprietor, now held by the pursuer, and founded on as the title to sue in this action. After that date he denies the subtenancy, and maintains that the subjects of his occupation are held by him directly from the proprietors, and could not be held under the pursuer, because, as alleged, they are excluded from this new lease of 1845.

The defence thus stated is twofold—(1) that the title of the pursuer is bad, as not inclusive of the subjects; and (2) that there is no truth in the allegation of subtenancy on which the action is based.

Now the case has been disposed of by the Sheriff with exclusive reference to the first of these pleas, without inquiry into the matter involved in the second. although that, as I view the case, was truly the primary subject for investigation. Holding, as I think must be held, that there is a relevant averment of subtenancy, this is for inquiry, as matter of fact, being denied by the defender, before disposing of the objection taken to the title of the pursuer. For if it be established that the defender did, after 1845, de facto possess these subjects, and pay rent for them to the pursuer as his subtenant, the objection to the title to sue will permit of being very easily disposed of, or rather the necessity of disposing of it at all may be superseded.

Upon that objection I may observe, that taken by itself, apart from the title under the proprietors alleged by the defender, I would have felt the same reluctance as the Sheriff has expressed, in holding it sufficient to bar the action. The words of exclusion—although strong and sufficient, it may be, to destroy the title of the pursuer, had there been nothing to explain the extent of his right, in a question with the proprietors—cannot be considered incapable of being construed as between them and their own tenant; and, in fact, the extent of the pursuer's right under the lease has been cleared as against the proprietors. This, of course, cannot avail the pursuer as in competition with any right held by the defender from the proprietors. But whether there exists such a distinct right to possess the subjects in the defender has not yet been proved. Certainly it is not admitted by the pursuer—his case being that the defender is his subtenant. These matters are on the merits, and until they are made the subject of proof, I do not well see how the objection to the title can be finally disposed of, or even properly considered.

LORD MURRAY.—I do not dissent from the result at which your Lordships have arrived; but I do not mean to go into the points before us as your Lordships have done, and I agree in thinking that this case should be remitted back to the Sheriff.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Advocate the cause: Recall in hoc statu the interlocutors of the 23d of July and 3d of November 1856 complained of, and remit the cause to the Sheriff, with instructions, before answer as to the pursuer's title, to allow to both parties a proof of their averments in regard to the house and garden in question, and to each party a conjunct probation; and thereafter to proceed to dispose of the case as to him may be just, with power to the Sheriff to dispose of all questions of expenses both in this Court and in the Sheriff Court.

ALEX. J. NAPIER, W.S.—JOHN GALLETLY, S.S.C.—Agents.

ROBERT HILL, Pursuer.—Pattison—Moir.

ROBERT LOCKHART DYMCK, Defender.—Penney.

No. 208.

Process—Reparation—Statute 16 & 17 Vict. cap. 67—Statute 9 Geo. IV. cap. 58, sect. 33—Public Officer.—In an action of damages against a burgh procurator-fiscal for wrongous imprisonment under a police sentence which was found null,—Plea in defence repelled (aff. judgment of Lord Neaves), that the statutory limitation of three months within which the action must be brought, applied not to the issuing, but the execution of the warrant.

Process—Relevancy.—Observed, that in the Outer-House an erroneous practice prevailed of deciding pleas upon relevancy, as prejudicial pleas, in cases where the merits were truly involved.

SEE supra, p. 47.

The pursuer was convicted, on 18th July 1855, for breach of certificate under the statutes passed for the regulation of public-houses. On 2d August 1855 he was incarcerated on a warrant of that date for payment of the penalties. Of same date he presented a note of suspension and liberation, which was passed; and a record having been made up, the Court, on 18th November 1856, found the judgment and warrant null. On 17th October 1855, the pursuer brought this action, concluding for L.1000 of damages against the procurator-fiscal for wrongous imprisonment. The ground of action was, that "by the said wrongful, illegal, oppressive, and unwarrantable proceedings against the pursuer, and his apprehension and exposure on the public streets of Edinburgh as a prisoner, and his incarceration and detention in prison in manner foresaid, the pursuer has been grievously injured in his character, credit, reputation, and business; his feelings having been deeply wounded, and his health impaired."

The defender's pleas were as follows:—"1. The pursuer's statements on record are irrelevant, and insufficient to support the conclusions of the

July 7, 1857.

1st Division.
Lord Neaves.
C.

No. 208.
 —
 July 7, 1857.
 Hill v.
 Dymock.

action. 2. The action is barred and excluded, in respect it was not commenced within three months after the cause of action or prosecution had arisen. In any view, the pursuer is barred from objecting to the conviction. 3. The defender is not responsible for any irregularity or informality either in the judgment or conviction, or in the warrant of imprisonment; or at least he is not responsible for any of the irregularities or informalities alleged by the pursuer in this case, and which were committed, not by the defender, but either by the magistrate or clerk of court. 4. The prosecution against the pursuer having been instituted and conducted by the defender in the bona fide discharge of his public duty as procurator-fiscal, and neither malice nor want of probable cause being alleged, the pursuer has no good cause of action against him. 5. The pursuer having sustained no damage in consequence of the irregularities or informalities, or any of them, in the proceedings complained of, no damages are due."

The Lord Ordinary, on 26th June 1857, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Having heard parties' procurators on the defender's first and second pleas in law, and considered the record and whole process, repels the said pleas: Finds the pursuer entitled to the modified sum of four guineas of expenses of process, occasioned by the material alterations made by the defender on his pleadings in the course of adjusting the record, and of which question the consideration was formerly reserved; and decerns against the defender for payment thereof: Further, appoints parties respectively, within eight days, to prepare and lodge a draft of such issues and counter issues as they propose for the trial of the cause." *

* "NOTE.—In the course of the discussion in this case, the second plea in law for the defender, which had been added during the adjustment of the record, was taken into consideration first in order. That plea is founded on the following provision of the Act 9 Geo. IV., cap. 58, sect. 33:—"That every action or prosecution against any Sheriff, justice of the peace, magistrate, constable, or other person, on account of anything done in the execution of this Act, shall be commenced within three months after the cause of action or prosecution shall have arisen, and not afterwards."

"Assuming that the defender maintains that, in giving effect to the limitation of action here enacted, the period of three months is to be held as consisting of lunar and not of calendar months, it still appears to the Lord Ordinary that the action has been brought within a sufficient time. The cause of action, as libelled, is the pursuer's apprehension and incarceration, which took place on 2d August, while the action was commenced on 17th October 1855. The illegality of that proceeding is said to arise from the nullity or invalidity of the warrant, dated also the 2d August, partly as being informal in itself, and partly as following upon an irregular and illegal sentence, dated 18th July 1855. But even in so far as the previous proceedings are referred to, they are not the cause of action, although their objectionable nature is founded on as giving the character of illegality to the apprehension and incarceration for which the pursuer claims reparation. It appears to the Lord Ordinary, that in cases of this kind the cause of action means the overt act or proceeding which gives immediate occasion to the complaint, and not any previous act or procedure which may come to be founded on in support of the action. An action of damages for imprisonment on an illegal warrant does not arise when the illegal warrant is granted or issued, much less when any anterior proceedings affecting its legality have taken place. The injury and cause of action is the actual execution of the warrant when it is not legal, and the consequent invasion of personal liberty when no legal warrant exists for such a step.

"With regard to the defender's first plea in law, as to the relevancy of the action, the Lord Ordinary considers that the case is somewhat of a special or peculiar nature. He would be unwilling to hold that, in ordinary criminal procedure, a prosecutor is liable in damages for the execution of a sentence, in which the judge may have committed some irregularity, over which the prosecutor has no control. Neither is the Lord Ordinary of opinion that a party will in general be liable in damages for enforcing a decree, whether civil or criminal, which is altogether formal

The defender reclaimed, and prayed the Court to sustain his first four pleas in law, and to assoilzie him from the conclusions of the action. He pleaded, that it was part of his duty to enforce the Acts under which the pursuer was apprehended. The only informality in the procedure had been the omission of certain statutory expressions in the sentence. But the sentence was pronounced by the Judge in the cause. It was not the dictum of the procurator-fiscal; and it being the judgment and not the warrant that was complained of, action was barred by the lapse of the statutory limitation. But further, the action was not relevant, there being no allegation of malice and want of probable cause. The defender was therefore entitled to have his first four pleas sustained as pleas upon the relevancy. The question came to be, whether, in every case whatsoever, where a judgment is set aside for irregularity, however slight, that necessarily raises an action of damages—whether a claim of damages is correlative with the right of having the judgment annulled?

No. 208.
July 7, 1857.
Hill v.
Dymock.

Counsel for the pursuer were not called on.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I do not require to hear anything more. The matter is perfectly plain. This action is expressly laid on the ground of the pursuer's apprehension, imprisonment, and detention in prison, at the instance of the defender, which he alleges was wrongous, illegal, and oppressive, without lawful warrant, and following upon the alleged incompetent, irregular, wrongous, and illegal proceedings which he sets forth, and which he also alleges was to his great loss, injury, and damage. Now that ground of action must run from the date of the pursuer's apprehension; for, although the origo mali was in the form of a judgment, the action is limited to the pursuer's "apprehension, imprisonment, and detention in prison." Therefore, upon that point, I think the Lord Ordinary is quite right.

As to the other matters, I do not think we are in a condition to deal with them. We must therefore recall in hoc statu, and adhere quoad ultra.

LORD DEAS.—The cause of action here was the alleged wrongous apprehension; and it was therefore quite right to repel the objection that the action had not been or regular, but which may afterwards be set aside in a court of review.—See Aitken v. Finlay, 25th Feb. 1837, 15 Shaw, 683. But the peculiarity of the present case is, that in these proceedings, which are not properly criminal, a sentence was pronounced which was contrary to the statute on which it was founded, and which has consequently been reduced and set aside as null; while, moreover, the execution of that sentence was not the mere act of the court or of the law, but was the act of the prosecutor himself. The original sentence ordained payment of a penalty; and upon failure of payment, it lay with the prosecutor to follow it up or not as he pleased, by applying for and using a warrant of imprisonment as an executorial for enforcing the original sentence. Before doing so, it seems to have been the prosecutor's duty and business to see that he had a valid sentence which could be so enforced, just as it is the part of any ordinary pursuer to see that his decree is regular before he puts it in execution by diligence.

"There is here an objection stated to the regularity of the warrant of imprisonment itself. But apart from that circumstance, it seems, on the grounds already indicated, to be a relevant ground for an action of damages, that a prosecutor has obtained and enforced a warrant of imprisonment upon a sentence previously obtained, but which was a nullity, from its being disconform to the statute under which alone it could proceed. The invasion of a party's personal liberty by a warrant obtained ex parte, and therefore periculo petentis, without any good or formal foundation to support it, and where the procedure is out of the statute applicable to the case, seems to afford a sufficient ground for claiming reparation.

"It is true that the pursuer might at once have obtained a review by suspension of the original sentence pronounced against him, and his omission to do so in time may enter into the question or quantum of damages. But it does not seem to destroy the relevancy of an action of damages any more than a similar omission would have that effect where an irregular charge of horning had been given, and no suspension had been brought till a caption was put in force."

No. 208.
—
July 8, 1857.
Moodie v.
Skae.

instituted within the statutory period of three months. But in other respects the interlocutor affords an instance of the inexpediency of the practice of taking up a plea against relevancy as a prejudicial plea, because of its being so urged by the defender. The consequence here is, that while, in form, the defender's third and fourth pleas are untouched, they are, in effect, disregarded; and indeed the whole cause is virtually decided, except the quantum of damages. The first plea (which is repelled) relates both to the relevancy and sufficiency of the pursuer's statements to support the conclusions of the action. Now, if the statements be relevant without alleging malice or want of probable cause, the defender's fourth plea is of course ill founded, although the Lord Ordinary in his note makes no remark upon that plea. He does, however, enter fully into the matter of the third plea, which relates to the defender's responsibility for the irregularity of the procedure; and this just illustrates how relevancy is here mixed with the whole merits, and that any judgment upon relevancy is premature. The proper course is to appoint issues to be lodged; and then will arise a question, which may go, no doubt, to the root of the action, whether any issue can be granted where there is no allegation of malice or want of probable cause? But that question is, in the first instance, for discussion before the Lord Ordinary, who, although he cannot settle the issues if the parties continue to differ, may materially ripen the cause by reporting his opinion.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—I concur both as to the limitation in point of time, and also as to the matter of relevancy, and I hope that the judgments the Court are now pronouncing will lead to a change of practice in the Outer-House; and that the Lords Ordinary will exercise a sound discretion in disposing of questions of relevancy, and not dispose of them as a matter of course when parties ask them.

LORD IVORY absent.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall in hoc statu the interlocutor reclaimed against, in so far as it repels the first plea in law for the defender: Quoad ultra adhere to the said interlocutor, and refuse the desire of the said reclaiming note: Find the defender liable to the pursuer in the expenses of process incurred by him since the date of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor reclaimed against; and remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed with the cause, with power to his Lordship to decern for the expenses hereby found due, as they shall be taxed by the Auditor of Court."

DAVID MANSON, S.S.C.—PATRICK GRAHAM, W.S.—Agents.

No. 209.

A B, Pursuer.—Macfarlane.
DAVID SKAE, Defender.—Penney—Gifford.

Process—Issues—Amendment of adjusted issue.—An issue as adjusted put the question, Whether, "in the house No. 5 Brown Street," &c.—Held competent to amend the issue by adding the word "Lane," conformably to the description in the record, and striking out "No. 5," there being no such number either in the street or lane,—also by adding "then occupied by" so and so, "and now or lately occupied by" so and so.

July 8, 1857.

—
1st Division.
Lord Neaves.
C.

IN this case the following issues were adjusted on 24th June:—

"1. Whether, about the beginning, or earlier part, of the year 1854, the defender did, within the Royal Lunatic Asylum, Morningside, and again about the end, or latter part, of said year, within the house at Greenhill, near Edinburgh, then occupied by the Rev. John Kirk, minister of the Independent Chapel, Brighton Street, Edinburgh, or on one or other of these occasions, falsely and calumniously state to the said Rev. John Kirk that the pursuer had committed fornication with C D, now or sometime residing in Leith,—or did make a charge and statement of and concerning the pursuer, of similar import and meaning, to her loss, injury, and damage?

"2. Whether the defender, times and places foresaid, did falsely and calumniously state to the said Rev. John Kirk, that a fama or report existed relative to the character of the pursuer, to the effect that she had committed No. 209.

 fornication with the said C D,—or did make a statement of and concerning the pursuer of similar import and meaning, to her loss, injury, and damage? July 8, 1857.
 Damages laid at L.500. Moodie v.
 Skae.

Or,

“Whether the pursuer, in or about the month of March 1849, in a house No. 5 Brown Street, St Leonards, committed fornication with C D.”

Penney, for the defender, now moved for leave to alter the counter issue, to the effect of deleting the words “No. 5,” and adding, after the word “street,” the word “Lane,” and after the word “St Leonards,” “then occupied by Mrs Ainslie or Henderson, and now or lately occupied by James Turner.” He submitted that it was quite competent after an issue was engrossed to correct a manifest blunder.¹ In this case the omission of the word “Lane” was clearly a clerical error; for the words of the record were, “in a house in or near Brown Street Lane, St Leonards.” Again, the words “No. 5” would lead to ambiguity, if taken as the actual locus, for it was difficult to say what were the numbers of the lane, or whether there were five houses. The words proposed to be inserted were better calculated to identify the house.

Macfarlane, for the pursuer.—If the insertion of “No. 5” be a blunder, the Court would not allow it to be amended,² nor had they the power to do so after the issues had been definitely settled. The effect of the alteration would be to allow the parties to change the ground of defence, for the proposed correction was not of a clerical error in the description. The localities were different. The alteration was now incompetent.³

LORD PRESIDENT.—There are two alterations which the defender proposes to make. One is to insert the word “lane,” after the words “Brown Street.” He says its omission was a clerical error. So far as we can judge it appears to be so, for in the record the expression is “Brown Street Lane,” and not “Brown Street.” If the defender had demanded an issue specifying “No. 5 Brown Street,” and the pursuer had objected, we could not have granted it. It is not usual to take an issue of “in or near a street,” when it is some other place.

The next point is, whether the number can be deleted. I am more doubtful about that. But it is not in the record. It was suggested at the time of adjusting the issues, in order to meet the pursuer’s desire to have the locus identified, and I put the question, whether the defender was sure of the street, and of the number? and I was told that he was. I think that, considering the way in which it was introduced, it may be amended.

As to the insertion of the other words, I think that the pursuer is entitled to have them.

LORD CURRIEHILL concurred.

LORD DEAS.—As to the deletion of “No. 5,” I understand the fact to be, that there is no No. 5 either in Brown Street or in Brown Street Lane, so that not being in the record, there is not much difficulty in allowing this deletion. As to the addition of the words, “then occupied by Mrs Henderson,” the effect of allowing it will of course be to limit the pursuer, and the defender cannot object to that. The main point therefore is the insertion of the word “lane;” and if this word had not been in the record, the objection would have been serious. But it is in the record, and the effect of the amendment is merely to make the issue and record correspond. I think therefore the alterations may be allowed.

LORD IVORY absent.

THE counter issue, as adjusted, was as follows:—“Whether the pur-

¹ Muir v. Caldwell, 24th March 1853, ante, vol. xv. p. 590; Edwards v. Begbie, 3d Dec. 1850, ante, vol. xiii. p. 227.

² Kinloch v. Hill, 19th June 1855, ante, vol. xvii. p. 958.

³ Act of Sederunt 29th Nov. 1810, sect. 10, Statute 13 & 14 Vict. cap. 36, sect. 39.

No. 209

July 8, 1857.
Maclachlan v.
Meiklam.

suer, in or about the month of March 1849, in a house in Brown Street Lane, St Leonards, then occupied by Mrs Ainslie or Henderson, and now or lately occupied by James Turner, committed fornication with C D."

RANKEN, WALKER, & JOHNSTON, W.S.—JOHN ROBERTSON, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 210.

GEORGE MACLACHLAN, Complainer.—Penney—Macfarlane.
JOHN MEIKLAM AND OTHERS, Respondents.—Moir—A. R. Clark.

Jurisdiction—Foreign—Interdict.—A proprietor of landed estates in Scotland died in England possessed of considerable personalty. By antenuptial contract of marriage he had made a provision for his children, subject to his apportionment, and he afterwards granted a bond and disposition in security therefor over an estate in Scotland to trustees. He also executed a trust-disposition and settlement in the Scotch form, but with an attestation in the English form; one purpose of the trust being, the payment of the childrens' provision. He executed a deed of apportionment and two codicils. These his son challenged by proceedings in Chancery, and he claimed to have the trust-settlement administered under the direction of that Court. The Master of the Rolls having pronounced an order "to deposit in the Record and Will Office all the title-deeds, muniments, and documents," in the possession of the testamentary trustees, who were all in Scotland;—Held (aff. judgment of Lord Curriehill), that the trustee under the bond and disposition in security was entitled to interdict against the deeds constituting the provision and his trust and security, and the title-deeds of the estate, being removed beyond the jurisdiction of the Court of Session, reserving right to apply for exhibition of them so far as necessary in the English proceedings.

July 9, 1857.

1st Division.
Ld. Curriehill.
L.
Bill-Chamber.

THE deceased James Meiklam died in England in October 1854, possessed of considerable personalty, and large heritable estates in Scotland. He was survived by his wife, and by a son and daughter. By antenuptial contract of marriage Mr Meiklam provided for the payment of L.20,000 to the children of the marriage at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after his death—which sum was to be divisible by him in such proportions as he should appoint. The complainer, George Maclachlan, was the sole surviving trustee for administering that provision under a bond and disposition in security by Mr Meiklam in his favour, and another trustee now deceased, dated 17th February 1846, and extending over his lands of Carnbroe, situated in Scotland. The respondents were Mr Meiklam's testamentary trustees and executors under a trust-disposition and settlement dated 31st January 1853, and two codicils, dated respectively 31st May and 9th August 1853.

Mr Meiklam's contract of marriage was in the Scotch form. A voluntary contract of separation in the Scotch form was entered into between Mr and Mrs Meiklam on 17th February 1846. The bond and disposition in security of same date was also in the Scotch form. It narrated Mr Meiklam's contract of marriage and the contract of separation; and contained an assignation to the whole writs "and title-deeds of and concerning the lands and others thereby disposed." Mr Meiklam's trust-disposition and settlement was in the Scotch form. It had ob majorem cautelam an attestation in terms of the English Wills Act, executed at London upon the 31st January 1853, and was recorded in the Books of Council and Session upon the 18th October 1854. Mr Meiklam was therein designed of Carnbroe, in the shire of Lanark, Scotland, "presently residing in London," and the estate was conveyed to the respondents' testamentary trustees—one of the purposes of the trust being the payment of the truster's debts, particularly the provision of L.20,000.

Mr Meiklam exercised the power of apportionment by a deed of division in the Scotch form; but having ob majorem cautelam an attestation in the English form appended thereto, executed at London the 28th March 1853, No. 210. and recorded along with the trust-disposition and settlement. Mr Meiklam apportioned L.100 to his son, and L.19,900 to his daughter. The codicils were executed by Mr Meiklam in the Scotch form, and had also an attestation in the English form appended thereto. July 9, 1857.

MacLachlan v.
Meiklam.

The respondents having entered upon the management inter alia of the estate of Carnbroe—which contained minerals of great value—one of their number, Mr Campbell, with consent of the others, obtained probate of the deeds of settlement from the Prerogative Court of the Archbishop of Canterbury on the 30th November 1854, in favour of himself, a power being reserved of making a like grant in favour of the other executors named in the settlement, when they should apply for the same. The complainer now stated that Mr Meiklam's personal estate had proved insufficient for the payment of his personal debts; that the complainer had no security over the minerals in Carnbroe, which were expressly excepted from the conveyance in his bond; and that after deducting the interest of preferable securities, the remainder of the rents of the lands were not sufficient to pay one-half of the interest of the L.20,000, and that the complainer must therefore fall back on the remaining trust-estate, vested in the respondents, for the remainder of the interest. That Mr Meiklam's son had instituted a suit in the Prerogative Court of the Archbishop of Canterbury against Mr Campbell, challenging the deed of division and two codicils, for the purpose of having them revoked and annulled; and that he had also filed a bill in Chancery against the respondents, his sister, and certain other parties beneficially interested under the trust-dispositions, alleging, inter alia, that the deed of division and two codicils were void and inoperative as against him, and claiming to have the trust carried into effect under direction of the Court of Chancery. That the defendants had entered a conditional appearance, and that the Master of the Rolls had pronounced an order, "to deposit in the Record and Will Office all the title-deeds, muniments, and documents," in the possession of the testamentary trustees, or others having the same. Art. 17 of the complainer's statement was as follows:—"The said James Meiklam was a Scotchman by birth, and had large landed property in Scotland, and was at the time of the execution of the various deeds hereinbefore recited, and at the time of his death, domiciled in Scotland. The trustees are Scotch trustees, the estate they have to administer is a Scotch landed estate, and the trust-deeds they have to carry into execution are Scotch deeds." The complainer therefore craved interdict against the trustees or their agents removing beyond the jurisdiction of the Court any of the writs or title-deeds of the lands and estates of Carnbroe "and others, situated in Scotland, which belonged to the deceased James Meiklam, and were disposed by him to the complainer by the said bond and disposition in security for L.20,000, dated 17th May 1846, and the title-deeds, writs, evidents, and vouchers, or any of them, of any other estates or effects vested in or held by the respondents, as said testamentary trustees and executors, and liable to the complainer for payment of the said sum or provision of L.20,000, and interest thereof; and also the deeds and instruments under which the said sum or provision is constituted and payable, or any of them, and from giving up the same, or any of them, to any party or parties, to be so removed or otherwise to be put beyond the control of the said testamentary trustees and executors, and the jurisdiction of your Lordships, and beyond the reach of any Scotch process or diligence competent to the complainer."

Answers were lodged for the respondent Mr John Meiklam, who stated (art. 5), that "as the deceased Mr Meiklam was, at the time of his death, domiciled in England, and had considerable property there, the Courts of that country have, by the law thereof, undoubted jurisdiction, and are the

No. 210.
 —
 July 9, 1857.
 MacLachlan v.
 Meiklen.

proper Courts to determine all questions regarding the succession of the deceased, and the rights and interests of all parties therein. As the parties chiefly interested in the said succession are resident in England, it is the most convenient forum for trying the said questions." And after stating that production of the titles was absolutely necessary for carrying on the suit raised by him in Chancery, and, if required in Scotland, they would be produced under proper guards for their security,—he averred that the complainer was the acting agent and factor for the trustees and executors, and that the present application had not been made for the purpose of carrying out the trust-deed, or of securing the interests of the beneficiaries therein, but under the instructions, or at least with the connivance, of the trustees and executors, and in order to afford them a pretence for not implementing the order of the Court of Chancery, and thereby defeating the rights of the respondent. He therefore pleaded that the interdict should be refused.

The Lord Ordinary, on 22d April 1857, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Having considered the note of suspension, with the answers and productions, passes the note, and continues the interdict, reserving to the respondents, or either of them, to apply to the Lord Ordinary or the Court for the exhibition and use of the documents in question, in so far as the same may be found to be requisite in the proceedings in England, and all answers to such applications."

The respondent reclaimed, and pleaded;—That the complainer had no right to oppose the order for removal of the title-deeds, seeing that the interest of the party for whom he acted was represented in Chancery, and would be protected there.

The complainer pleaded;—That he appeared both in the capacity of judicial factor, as well as agent for the testamentary trustees. He was not only creditor, but quasi proprietor of the estate of Carnbroe, and was in these capacities entitled to withhold the titles.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary is right, and the interdict ought, in my opinion, to be continued against removing the writs and title-deeds of the property conveyed in security of the L.20,000 beyond the jurisdiction of the Court, but with power to apply to the Lord Ordinary, and under the conditions and limitations of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

I am also of opinion that the interdict should apply to the deeds and instruments under which the provision is constituted in favour of Mr MacLachlan, as trustee for the beneficiaries. That is the main element of the pursuer's title in this matter. And if they are matters that are fairly within the competition between the parties, it is only the more necessary to protect them from being carried off beyond the jurisdiction of this Court. But we cannot grant interdict as regards the title-deeds of the property other than that contained in the conveyance in security. I am not disposed to extend this interlocutor beyond the immediate subject of the right of this heritable creditor qua such.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—This case was considered by me in the Bill-Chamber, and the view which I took of it was this: The party who applies for this interdict is heritable creditor upon the estate of Carnbroe. The disposition in security in his favour conveys to him that estate, and also expressly the rights and title-deeds thereof in security of the L.20,000. In the character of disponent and assignee in security he has right to these title-deeds, and, if he chooses, to the possession of the estate itself. He could bring an action of mails and duties for that purpose. Seeing being the nature of his right to these documents, I was then of opinion, and I still remain of that opinion, that he is entitled to prevent the testamentary trustees from parting with possession of the title-deeds of the property over which that security extends, and above all, from putting them beyond the jurisdiction of this Court. When I pronounced judgment, however, I was not aware at that time that there was any other estate belonging to the truster within Scotland, which was not included in this security. From the explanation we have now had, it appears that there is a property not included. Of course, that conveyance in security does not comprehend such property, or the rights and title-deeds belonging thereto. No. 210.

 Therefore the complainer does not possess that title to them which I supposed he had when I pronounced this interlocutor, and it seems perfectly clear that he July 9, 1857.
 cannot be entitled to ask for interdict in respect to such property, for in regard to Kilgour.
 it he is in no better position than any personal creditor would be. Therefore, I concur entirely in thinking that there should be no interdict as to the subject of the estates other than what is included in the security. The pleadings before me did not direct attention to that difference, and I am glad of the opportunity of correcting it. The deeds and instruments which constituted the provision are distinctly the property of the judicial factor, and I am quite clear that the interlocutor should be adhered to, with the qualification suggested by your Lordship.

LORD DEAS.—I concur in the restricted interlocutor proposed to be pronounced by your Lordships. The respondent in Article 5 of his statement places the jurisdiction of the English Courts entirely upon the ground that “the deceased Mr Meiklam was at the time of his death domiciled in England, and had considerable property there.” But the complainer, on the other hand, alleges (stat. 17) that Mr Meiklam (who was a Scotchman by birth, and had landed estates in Scotland) was, both when the deeds in dispute were executed, and “at the time of his death, domiciled in Scotland.” Until, therefore, the domicile is ascertained we cannot assume the fact on which the respondent himself rests the jurisdiction of the English Courts; and this, of itself, would be a sufficient ground for preventing in the meantime any change as respects the custody of and power over the deeds constituting the complainer’s title to the heritable security, which forms, your Lordships know, an heritable Scotch estate. The only doubt I have is as to making the interdict applicable to some of the deeds which are not in the custody or under the power of the parties sought to be interdicted. But if this be not objected to by the parties themselves, it can of course do no harm.

LORD IVORY absent.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—“Adhere to the interlocutor reclaimed against, in so far as it passes the note, and as it continues the interdict formerly granted as to the title-deeds, writs, and evidents, or any of them, of the lands and estates of Carnbroe, and others situated in Scotland, which belonged to the deceased James Meiklam, and were disposed by him to the complainer by the bond and disposition in security for L.20,000, dated 17th May 1846, mentioned in the note of suspension: And also the following deeds executed by the said deceased James Meiklam, viz., his marriage-contract, contract of separation, and bond and disposition in security, instrument of sasine thereon, and deed of division, dated the 28th
 March 1853, subject to the reservations contained in the Lord Ordinary’s said interlocutor, which are also adhered to: Quoad ultra recall the interlocutor reclaimed against, and remit to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills to recall the interim interdict, except to the extent foresaid.”

ROBERT AINSLIE, W.S.—INGLIS & LESLIE, W.S.—MACLACHLAN & IVORY, W.S.—Agents.

ROBERT WILLIAM KILGOUR, Petitioner.—Boyle.

No. 211.

Entail—Petition—Amendment.

THIS petition was presented under the Entail Amendment Acts, to have July 10, 1857.
 improvements allowed. It prayed for service upon inter alios “William Thornby Kilgour.” 1ST DIVISION.

The intimation bore to have been made to William Thornborrow Kilgour, and on inquiry it turned out that this was the party’s real name.

PETITION allowed to be amended, without new intimation being ordered.

AULD & CHALMERS, W.S.—Agents.

No. 212.

SIR HEW DALRYMPLE, Bart., Petitioner.—Ross.

July 10, 1857. Entail Amendment Act—Consent—Tutor ad litem—Statutes 11 & 12 Vict. cap. 36, Dalrymple. sect. 4, and 16 & 17 Vict. cap. 94, sects. 4 and 5.

1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Mackenzie
L.

A PETITION was presented for authority to charge entailed estates with debt. The heirs, whose consents were required, were the petitioner's brother and his two sons, who were pupils. The deed of consent was signed by the brother for himself, and also as administrator-in-law and legal guardian for his sons. The Court appointed a tutor ad litem to the pupils; and, upon his giving his consent, the Court granted the prayer of the petition.

JOHN MURRAY, S.S.C.—Agent.

No. 213.

JOHN FOTHERINGHAM, Petitioner.—E. S. Gordon.

July 10, 1857. Judicial factor—Factor loco tutoris—Pupils Protection Act.
Fotheringham. SPECIAL powers were, after the usual proceedings, granted to a factor loco

1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Mackenzie
L.

tutoris of a pupil pro indiviso proprietor of heritable subjects, to make up titles and grant leases to endure to the term next after the pupil attaining minority. In one case the proposed lessee was the other pro indiviso proprietor.

KEEGAN & WALLACE, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 214.

MRS AGNES CHIENE OR THOMSON AND OTHERS, Petitioner.—Monro.

July 10, 1857. Judicial factor—Special powers.—The Court, on the petition of the beneficiaries, Thomson. appointed a judicial factor to a lapsed trust, but refused to grant him special powers in regard to the administration of the trust.

1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Mackenzie
C.

THE late Mrs Melville directed two sums of L.1266, 13s. 4d. and L.333, 6s. 8d. to be invested by her trustees for behoof of the petitioner, Mrs Thomson, in liferent, and her children in fee. On Mrs Melville's death the trustees accepted of the trust. They lent L.400 on heritable security. The remainder of the trust-funds were lent on personal security. The trustees all died without having assumed others to succeed them. The subjects over which the heritable security had been granted having been sold, it was proposed to pay up the principal sum; the present application was therefore made by the liferentrix and fiars for the appointment of a judicial factor to take the management of the trust, and also, in order to save expense, for special powers to the factor to make up titles and assign or discharge the heritable security.

THE COURT appointed a factor, but refused to grant any special powers.

JAMES MOORE, S.S.C.—Agent.

No. 215.

JOHN GORDON CUMING SKENE, Petitioner.—Macpherson.

July 10, 1857. Entail—11 & 12 Vict. c. 36, sect. 26—Trenching.
Skene.

1ST DIVISION.
C.

IN this case the Court authorised the petitioner to apply money consigned by a Railway Company, as compensation for entailed lands taken, in repayment of L.188, 11s. 9d. expended on trenching—the trenching not being accessory to drainage, but being, as reported by a man of skill, “executed in reclaiming a tract of 21 acres of old woodland, contiguous to the new steading of farm offices built on the home farm,”—the expense of which steading was also admitted as an improvement within the Act.¹

ARTHUR FORBES, W.S.—Agent.

¹ Ramsay, 21st Nov. 1854, ante, vol. xiv. p. 74; Farquharson, 19th June 1856, ante, vol. xviii p. 1044.

FRANCIS RUNCIE, Pursuer and Advocate.—E. S. Gordon—A. R. Clark. No. 216.
 MRS JANET YOUNG OR LEITH LUMSDEN AND OTHERS (Lumsden's Executors), Defenders and Respondents.—Penney—Hector. July 10, 1857.
 Runcie v.
 Lumsden's
 Executors.

Lease—Landlord and tenant—Meliorations—Transaction.—Circumstances in which, held, that at the expiry of his lease the tenant of a farm on an entailed estate had a good claim for meliorations against the executors of the heir of entail who had granted the lease.

FRANCIS RUNCIE, farmer at Greenlaw, brought this action in the Sheriff-1st Division. court of Aberdeenshire against the trustees and executors of the late Harry Ld. Mackenzie Leith Lumsden, heir of entail of the lands of Rosyburn, concluding for payment “ of the sum of L.120, as the sum agreed to be paid to the pursuer by the the said Harry Leith Lumsden, the pursuer's author, for houses on said farm of Greenlaw, at the termination of the said pursuer's lease thereof,” at Whitsunday 1852. A diligence was granted, and proof allowed in the inferior Court, under which a great deal of evidence, documentary and oral, was adduced.

The facts of the case, as disclosed by it, were thus stated in the interlocutor ultimately pronounced by the Inner-House:—“ Find it proven in point of fact—1st, That by missives of lease dated 27th March 1833, between the late Harry Leith Lumsden of Rosyburn and the advocator, and certain printed articles, conditions, and regulations therein referred to, the former let to the latter the farm of Greenlaw for nineteen years, and crops from Whitsunday 1833; and thereby, on the one hand, the advocator was taken bound, at the term of entry, to take off the houses on the farm from the outgoing tenant, and to pay the appreciated value thereof above the dead or lying inventory; and, on the other hand, the said Harry Leith Lumsden became bound, at the term of the tenant's removal, to pay to him a sum not exceeding one year's rent as the value of meliorations, including the value of the houses to be so paid for as aforesaid, at the tenant's entry, as these houses should stand at the termination of the lease, but exclusive of the amount of the heritor's or dead inventory. 2d, That the outgoing tenant, William Cowie, having authorised William Simpson, merchant in Blacktown, to act for him in the matter, the advocator and the said William Simpson appointed George Watt, mason in Macduff, and James Clark, wright in Keilhill, and the advocator appointed James Shand, mason in Macduff, and Nathaniel Mair, wright there, to appreciate the value of the houses payable by the advocator to the said William Cowie; 3d, That it is not proved that the said Harry Leith Lumsden furnished any heritor's or dead inventory to the advocator; but his factor Archibald Young, acting for him, wrote to the advocator, on 16th May 1833, that the landlord had no great objection to that valuation going on, provided the valuator should take care to value no houses but those sufficiently built, and which ought to be valued; that as there was a misunderstanding as to the extent of the allowances for buildings to be allowed to William Cowie, the advocator should state to him that the advocator's agreement to the valuation should be under the positive understanding that the same should not infer any obligation to pay for houses beyond the amount which Mr Cowie could instruct the heritor was bound to pay for or allow, by any agreement entered into between the heritor and him, and that the best way of making William Cowie aware of this was to read and give to him that letter, of which Mr Young had kept a copy; 4th, That accordingly that letter was delivered by the advocator to the said William Cowie, and was by him given to the said William Simpson as acting for him in that transaction, and on the following day, viz., the 17th of May 1833, the valuator appreciated the mason and wright-work, of which the value was so payable by the advocator to

No. 216. William Cowie, at the sum of L.141, 13s. 8d., conform to inventory and valuation signed by them, No. 2 of the Inferior Court Process: July 10, 1857. Runcie v. Lumsden's Executors. 5th, That the said inventory and valuation having been communicated to the said Archibald Young, on behalf of the landlord, and communications having taken place regarding the same between him and both the advocator and the said William Simpson, he, the said Archibald Young, objected to certain articles therein contained, amounting to L.14, as not being payable by the landlord, and in consequence that amount was deducted from the foresaid valuation; and the said Archibald Young having farther stated that he thought the value of the other articles was somewhat too high, and recommended a farther deduction, the said William Cowie and the advocator agreed also to that recommendation, and deducted the farther sum of L.10, 1s. 10d., whereby the appraised value of the said houses was reduced to the sum of L.117, 11s. 10d., and by a writing dated 11th November 1833, and signed by the said William Cowie and the advocator, that was stated to be the sum due by the latter to the former; 6th, That that sum, less 11s. 10d. as discount, was paid by the advocator to the said William Cowie, on 11th February 1834, conform to receipt of that date; 7th, That the said writing, dated 11th November 1833, and one duplicate of the foresaid inventory and valuation, having marked thereon the foresaid deductions proposed by Mr Young on the part of the landlord, and that the adjusted sum of L.117, 11s. 10d. was paid by the advocator to William Cowie, as aforesaid, were delivered to and retained by the said Archibald Young on behalf of the landlord, and another of the said inventory, and valuation and markings thereon, was retained by the advocator, and the said adjustment and settlement of the sum payable by the advocator to Mr Cowie under the foresaid lease between the said Harry Leith Lumsden and the advocator was acquiesced in by all concerned during the currency of that lease; 8th, That the said Harry Leith Lumsden died on or about 27th March 1844, and the respondents represented him as his testamentary trustees and executors; 9th, That the foresaid lease having expired at Whitsunday 1852, the value of the meliorations claimable by the advocator under the stipulations therein before mentioned then became payable; 10th, That, under a reference by the respondents and the advocator, the value of the foresaid houses, as they stood at the termination of the lease, was ascertained to be L.196, 3s. 5d. but that, one year's rent of the farm having been only L.120, the value of the meliorations claimable by the advocator is limited to that amount."

The defence mainly relied upon was, that Mr Harry Leith Lumsden, heir of entail, was not liable for the acts of his predecessor, Sir Harry Lumsden, who had granted the obligation upon which Cowie's claim for meliorations depended; and, the pursuer having been certiorated by Mr Young that Cowie had no claim against the late Mr Leith Lumsden, the sum thereafter paid by the pursuer to Cowie could not be dealt with as a claim against Mr H. L. Lumsden or his executors as under the lease of 1833.

The Sheriff-substitute (Watson) decerned against the defenders.*

The Sheriff-depute (Davidson) pronounced an interlocutor, in which

* It was remarked in the note attached to the interlocutor—"The only question seems to be whether the late Mr Lumsden was liable for the sum payable to the outgoing tenant in 1833, and if he was not, whether his executors are now entitled to set up that defence after all that took place in regard to the obligations imposed on the pursuer to pay the outgoing tenant the valuations consequent thereon and the payment by him. The Sheriff-substitute thinks that the conduct of the late Mr Lumsden, and whole circumstances, render the defenders liable to pay the pursuer's claim."

after various findings in fact, he "finds it not proved what the amount of the dead or lying inventory was at the time the aforesaid valuation in May 1833 was made by the pursuer and William Cowie: Finds it not proved that the said Harry Leith Lumsden was a party to that valuation, nor that he recognised and admitted that the said sum of L.117, 11s. 10d., or any part of the said sum, was due and payable to the said William Cowie, as outgoing tenant, at the end of his lease: Finds it not proved that the said sum was the surplus value above the dead or lying inventory, nor that there was any surplus value: Therefore assails the defenders, but, in the circumstances, finds no expenses due, and decerns." *

No. 216.
—
July 10, 1857.
Runcie v.
Lumsden's
Executors.

The pursuer advocated; arguing that the proof supported the summons, while Lumsden's executors maintained that he had never agreed to pay the £120 claimed for meliorations; that the claim was inconsistent with the advocate's lease; and that the parole proof adduced by him was incompetent, and ought not to have been admitted.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—I have found some embarrassment in forming an opinion in this case, in respect that neither the record nor the evidence are clear or satisfactory. Looking to the conclusions of the summons, the question is, whether the pursuer has proved that the landlord agreed to pay him this sum for which he includes. In the first place, according to the contract between the parties, there was an obligation upon the incoming tenant to pay something to the outgoing tenant in name of meliorations. There is a limitation as to the amount. But such an obligation necessarily imports that there were some buildings upon this farm over and above the landlord's inventory. The missives do not tell us what that inventory included. But it is quite plain that there was something to be valued and taken by the incoming tenant. Valuers were appointed. This became known to the landlord or his factor, and the day before the valuation the factor wrote to the pursuer the letter of 16th May 1833.

Now, the landlord did not send his inventory. Probably such an inventory did not exist. If it did, it behoved to be in his possession, and it was his duty in that case to have sent it, in order that parties at the valuation might see what was contained in it. But what he directs is this: That what should be valued should not be the whole subjects, but the houses sufficiently built; but that this was not to infer any obligation beyond the amount Cowie could instruct the landlord was bound to pay.

With this letter before parties the valuation proceeded, and the sum brought out at that valuation was L.141, 13s. 8d.

The valuation was made according to the instructions of the landlord, and there was every reason to assume that it was fairly made, because parties having adverse interests attended it. But the parties did not rest on their own opinions on the subject. Both the outgoing tenant, through his agent, and the incoming tenant went to the landlord, or what is the same thing, to his factor, and he went over the valuation, pointing out certain articles which he thought ought not to be included, and also criticising the valuation itself, as being in his opinion too high, and corrections were made on his suggestion. These corrections fairly implied approval of all the articles to which they did not apply. Those which were

* The following passages from the note of the Sheriff-depute shews his view of the law applicable to the case: — "Is it proved, that supposing Sir Harry Niven Lumsden, the former proprietor, had been in life in May 1833, Cowie would have had any good claim against him? There is no lease between Cowie and his landlord in this process, no agreements, no dead inventory, no proof of any surplus being due to him. If the pursuer could have shewn that Mr Lumsden or his factor recognised the sum paid by him to Cowie, or any part of that sum as really due, that would have been enough. But, unfortunately, he has not been able to do that." He added—"Still, the pursuer did pay Cowie a large sum, and it is possible to divest the case of the impression that it has come to a hard result for the pursuer."

No. 216.
 —
 July 10, 1857.
 Runcie v.
 Lumsden's
 Executors.

objected to altogether were deducted, and the sum thus brought out was actually paid by the advocator to the party who acted for Cowie, the outgoing tenant. One copy of the valuation so corrected was left with the landlord's factor, from whose repositories it was recovered under the diligence in this action, and another retained by the incoming tenant. The necessary presumption from all these circumstances is, that the landlord did agree to pay this sum to the incoming tenant, and to the extent of L.117, 11s. 10d. I think that the pursuer has made out his case.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I come substantially to the same conclusion, and on the same grounds.

LORD DEAS.—I attach great weight to the Sheriff's interlocutor, which he places upon perfectly judicial grounds. But the real question turns upon the matters of fact involved in his concluding finding, that it is not proved that Mr Harry Leith Lumsden was a party to the valuation between the pursuer and Cowie, nor that he recognised or admitted the L.117, 11s. 10d., or any part of it, to have been due to Cowie. Now, as regards the valuation, it is true enough that Mr Lumsden was not a party to it as fixing the actual amount due to Cowie. But through his factor, Mr Young, he was a party to it, as fixing the value of the buildings, subject to the question how much of that value was payable to Cowie. The advocator was bound by his lease to pay whatever allowances were due to Cowie, and that something was due to him is substantially admitted in Mr Young's letter of 16th May 1833, which bears, "as there is a misunderstanding as to the extent of allowances for buildings on the farm to be allowed to Mr William Cowie," the valuation should not infer an obligation in favour of Cowie beyond the amount he could shew the proprietor was bound to pay to him by any agreement between them. But it was the extent or amount of allowances due to Cowie which alone was disputed, and not the fact that something was due to him. Now, whose duty was it to produce the lease or agreement with Cowie, and likewise the dead inventory? Surely that of the landlord; and if he produces no dead inventory, how can he demand a deduction in respect of it from allowances otherwise admittedly due to Cowie? It was also his duty to have had an inventory made up with the advocator at his entry. For the articles of lease bear, "The tenant shall receive the houses on the farm by an inventory, and pay, at his entry, the surplus value above the dead or lying inventory." But I see no inventory given to the advocator at entry except the inventory and valuation between him and Cowie. Then the agreement of 11th November 1833, relative to that valuation, bears that, "in order to settle the matter," L.10, 1s. 10d. should be deducted from the valuation, "leaving L.117, 11s. 10d. sterling due by me Francis Runcie to said William Cowie." Now how could L.117, 11s. 10d. be due by the advocator to Cowie except upon the footing that this was the sum due to Cowie for the buildings after deducting whatever fell to be deducted from it? True, this was a mere agreement between the advocator and Cowie. But the material fact is that it was recovered out of the repositories of Young, the landlord's factor;—at least the depositions of havers bear so, and I cannot, without proof, assume the fact to have been otherwise. Now if the proprietor allows his incoming tenant to pay,—as it is admitted the advocator did pay,—L.117, 11s. 10d. to the outgoing tenant in implement of an obligation to pay him his allowances, and the proprietor keeps in his repositories, without objection, for nineteen years, an agreement bearing that this was the sum actually due,—can the proprietor, at the end of that time, turn round and say that not a sixpence of this is to be repaid upon such grounds as are pleaded here? I cannot arrive at that result, even apart from the deposition of the advocator, to the effect that he reported to Young the settlement he had made with Cowie, with which Young seemed well pleased. Young himself is dead, which is another result of the delay. But his son depones—"In all cases on Rosyburn, the outgoing and incoming tenants of any of the possessions invariably settled together after consulting my father." I do not doubt that this happened here, and that it would be altogether unjust now to disallow a payment bona fide made on the understanding that it was acquiesced in, and was to be repaid by the landlord.

LORD IVORY absent.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor :—(After the findings in fact above quoted)—“Find in these circumstances in point of law, that by the conditions of the foresaid lease the respondents, as representing the said Harry Leith Lumsden, are liable in payment of that sum, with interest from Whitsunday 1852: Therefore repel the defences; decern in terms of the libel: Find the respondents liable to the pursuer in the expenses incurred by him, both in this Court and in the Inferior Court: Appoint an account,” &c. No. 216.
July 10, 1857.
Cullen v.
Kerr.

WEBSTER & RENNY, W.S.—JOPP & JOHNSTON, W.S.—Agents.

JOHN CULLEN, Pursuer.—Penney—Buchanan.
ARCHIBALD KERR, Defender.—Macfarlane—A. R. Clark.

No. 217.

Agent and Principal—Repetition—Reparation—Relevancy.—A broker instructed to purchase railway shares on 15th October, of that date notified the purchase of 180 to his employer, who, on 6th November, paid the price and got the transfer, but did not register. The seller of 50 of these shares brought an action against him to compel him to register, and for relief of calls. It turned out that these 50 shares had been purchased on 6th November. The purchaser was assoilzied, but without expenses.

The purchaser now sued the broker for repetition of the price of the whole shares, and payment of the expenses incurred in the action at the instance of the seller of the 50 shares. Besides the objection to the 50 shares, it was alleged generally that none of the shares in the transfer were those purchased for him on 15th October.—Action dismissed—1. (alt. judgment of Lord Handyside, abs. Lord Ivory), as regarded the claim for repetition, in respect there were no conclusions for reduction of the transaction, nor was there any offer made to restore the transfers. 2. (aff. judgment of Lord Handyside), so far as regarded the claim for repayment of the expenses incurred in the other action.

IN October 1847, John Cullen, W.S., employed Kerr, a sharebroker in Glasgow, to purchase shares in the Great Northern Railway Company. On 14th October he wrote to Kerr, to the effect that if he had not bought the shares, “I renew the order for to-morrow;” and on 15th October Kerr wrote to Cullen: “I have bought for you 180 shares of the Great Northern Railway.” He also of same date wrote: “I now beg to send you list of to-day’s prices and purchase note, viz., of . . . 180 Great Northern.” July 10, 1857.
1st Division.
Ld. Handyside.
L.

After some correspondence as to the price, Cullen sent his clerk to Glasgow on 6th November 1847, with the amount. 447, 18s. 6d. This was paid to Kerr, who at the same time delivered to Cullen’s clerk the transfer and relative certificates as for 180 shares Great Northern. The transfer was signed by William Lindsay and Alexander Black. Sometime thereafter Black raised an action against Cullen, to compel him to register 50 Great Northern shares purchased from him, and to relieve him as seller of a call then due, and of all future calls. It was admitted in the course of the action that though these 50 shares were embraced in the transfer, they were not part of those bought on 15th October, but others bought on 6th November. The case was taken by appeal to the House of Lords, and, after a remit by them, Cullen was assoilzied, but the Court found no expenses due. (See ante, vol. xiii, p. 1114 and 1185; and vol. xv, p. 646.) Pending that action, Cullen raised an action of relief against Kerr; but, after defences were lodged, it was allowed to lie over till the issue of the one at Black’s instance, and it was now conjoined with the present action, which concluded, (1), for repetition of “the sum of L.446, which the defender wrongfully or by undue concealment obtained and received from the pursuer, on or about the 6th day of November 1847, and thereafter wrongfully retained or misapplied;” and, (2), for payment of “L.1500, or such other sum as shall be found to be the amount of the costs incurred by the pursuer in defending

No. 217.
 July 10, 1857.
 Cullen v.
 Kerr.

himself against the action" at the instance of Black against him, "both in this Court and in the House of Lords, with the legal interest thereof," &c. In his condescendence the pursuer narrated the circumstances attending his employment of Kerr in 1847, his instructions, and the correspondence that ensued. He quoted the transfer, which commenced as follows:—"I William Lindsay of Edinburgh Esquire in consideration of the sum of L. paid to me by John Cullen Esquire of York Place Edinburgh writer to the signet do hereby assign and transfer to the said John Cullen one hundred and thirty shares numbered &c.—And I Alexander Black of Glasgow accountant in consideration of the sum of L. paid to me by the said John Cullen, do hereby assign and transfer to the said John Cullen fifty shares numbered &c. of and in the undertaking called the Great Northern Railway Company," &c. It was signed by Lindsay, Black, and by the pursuer, who now averred "he had no knowledge of, nor any previous communication with, either of these persons, and, in particular, he had no contract, agreement, or connection of any kind with Mr Black, who was an entire stranger. But as he believed that the instrument truly, and bona fide related to, and was meant to be in fulfilment of the purchases previously made for him by the defender on the 15th October, professing, as it does, to transfer the exact number of shares reported by the defender as having been purchased for him on that occasion, he, without hesitation, put his name to it. But the pursuer afterwards discovered that the shares referred to in this deed formed no part of the shares purchased by him or by the defender on his account on the 15th October; that, in fact, the defender had made no such purchase at that time, and had never at any time purchased any shares whatever, either from Lindsay or Black, on the pursuer's account. Accordingly, in an action at the instance of the said Alexander Black against the present pursuer it was admitted by Black, and was a fixed point, that the sale alleged to have been made by him, and in implement of which he granted the above transfer, did not take place till the 6th of November 1847, and could not, therefore, by possibility, include or apply to shares confessedly purchased for the pursuer by the defender on the 15th October preceding. The price of the shares said to have been sold on the 6th November, did not correspond with any of the prices at which the defender reported the various purchases to have been made for the pursuer on the 15th of October. While the numbers of the shares are carefully specified in both transfers, the price or consideration money is in both left blank. If there was any reality in the transaction, or any price at all, either stipulated for, or paid to, the parties appearing as alleged venders in the transfer, so vitally material a circumstance as the amount of the price or consideration money must of necessity have been set forth in the instrument; but while the parties concerned were at the pains to specify minutely the numbers of the shares, they left the price or consideration money an entire blank. It afterwards appeared that the railway company had made a call of L.2, 10s. per share on the 3d of November, three days before the date of the alleged sale on the 6th, which neither Lindsay nor Black had paid. By that neglect or failure they were disqualified from executing any transfer. The transfer, as sent by the defender to the pursuer, was incapable of registration, and was truly inoperative and unavailing. On the other hand, the pursuer was not in possession of any materials which could have enabled him to supply the defects in the instrument, as no such materials were furnished to him, nor any information given to his clerk by the defender when the money was paid. . . . After signing the transfer the pursuer became aware that it was wholly inoperative."

The pursuer then narrated further correspondence, which issued in the actions above referred to, and after detailing the action at Black's instance and the result of it, he pleaded—"1. As the pursuer's instructions to the defender to purchase Great Northern shares on his account were limited to No. 217. purchases to be made on the 15th of October 1847, and as the defender July 10, 1857.

duly reported that he had fulfilled his instructions by the several purchases Cullen v.
made on that day, whereof he communicated all the particulars in a regular Kerr.

purchase note, he was not entitled, without the pursuer's knowledge, consent, and fresh instructions, to make any new or additional purchases for him. And as the defender did unwarrantably, and in violation of his duty, involve the pursuer in a new pretended purchase, falsely said to have been made on his account on the 6th November, of which the pursuer knew nothing, and for which he gave no authority, the defender is liable to relieve and indemnify the pursuer against that alleged transaction and all its consequences.

2. As the defender represented the purchase said to have been made on the 6th November as one of those made on 15th October, and thereby misled the pursuer into that belief, on the faith of which he induced the pursuer to pay to him the sum of L.446 as the price of said shares last mentioned, he is now in law and justice liable to repeat and pay back to the pursuer the said sum, with interest thereof, as libelled. 3. As the defender was the cause of the pursuer being involved in a long litigation with Black, the result of which is that there was no such transaction between Black and the pursuer as the defender falsely represented, he is now liable to relieve the pursuer of the whole expense of that litigation."

Pleaded for the defender;—1. The pursuer's averments were irrelevant. 2. "The defender having acted in conformity with the employment and instruction given him by the pursuer, and according to the usage and rules of the Glasgow Stock Exchange, he is entitled to absolvitor. 3. The pursuer having adopted and acquiesced in the transaction as completed for him by the defender, and having taken the shares and accepted of the transfers thereto, and retained the same as his own property for so long a period, is debarred from now maintaining such an action as the present."

The Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor, in which he "finds that the pursuer has stated relevant grounds to entitle him to insist in the first conclusion of his last raised summons, that the defender should repeat and pay back to him the sum of L.446 sterling, therein concluded for; and allows" issues to be lodged: "And with regard to the second conclusion of the same summons, for payment to the pursuer of such sum as shall be found to be the amount of the costs incurred by the pursuer in defending himself against the action at the instance of Alexander Black, Finds that the pursuer has not set forth sufficient grounds to subject the defender to make payment as concluded for, and in so far dismisses the summons," "reserving all questions of expenses." *

* "NOTE.—The cause was debated before the Lord Ordinary, on the relevancy and sufficiency of the pursuer's averments to subject the defender to the conclusions of the action; and, in the course of the discussion, the pursuer was allowed to lodge tentative issues, upon which the debate was resumed. These issues were treated as explanatory of the grounds of the pursuer's action, and not as superseding a judgment on the relevancy independently of them. Should the action be sustained as regards either conclusion, the defender reserved what he should urge as to framing the issues to try the cause.

"There are two actions which have been conjoined, the first being an action of relief, brought by the pursuer in consequence of the action raised against him by Mr Black. That action having been followed by defences, was allowed to lie over for several years, apparently till the action at Black's instance had been brought to a conclusion. The result of it is matter of notoriety, from the reports of the case in this Court and in the House of Lords. Its final conclusion was, that the pursuer obtained absolvitor, but without expenses. The pursuer then raised a new action against the defender, and, being conjoined with the action of relief, a record was made up and closed. The new action appears to embrace in its conclusions all the

No. 217. Both parties reclaimed;—The defender, in so far as the interlocutor found that “the pursuer had stated relevant grounds to entitle him to insist in the first conclusion of his last raised summons,” &c., and the pursuer against the last finding of the interlocutor.

July 10, 1857.
Cullen v.
Kerr.

claims of the pursuer against the defender; and though the fact of the action of relief having been brought and conjoined with the latter is to be kept in view, it seems to the Lord Ordinary that the necessity of any judgment being pronounced on the conclusions of the former is now removed by the issue of Black's action, and the specific conclusion applicable to that state of matters introduced into the later action, and supported by the averments on record.

“The pursuer insists upon two separate claims. The first is, that the defender should repeat and pay back the sum of L.446, which the summons alleges that he wrongfully, and by undue concealment, obtained and received from the pursuer, and retained or misapplied, under the circumstances averred on record. The other is, that he should make payment to the pursuer of the sum of L.1500, or such other sum as shall be found to be the amount of the costs incurred by the pursuer in this Court and in the House of Lords, in defending himself against the action by Black, from which he finally obtained absolvitor, but without expenses. The defender, Mr Kerr, pleaded that there were no relevant or sufficient grounds to subject him under either conclusion. The Lord Ordinary has seen cause to draw a distinction between them, and is of opinion that the pursuer is entitled to an issue under the first conclusion, though he thinks that the second conclusion cannot be supported.

“The present case can scarcely be considered and disposed of under either of its conclusions, without reference to the previous case of Black v. Cullen, which originated out of the same business transaction. No doubt Mr Kerr was not a party to that case, and it may be open to him to resist the pursuer's claim for repetition of the sum of L.446 paid over to him, notwithstanding the view taken, in the former action, of the nature of the sale made by Black. Without prejudging the case which Mr Kerr may have in defence to the present action, when it shall come to be tried, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the pursuer has set forth on the record grounds, both relevant and sufficient, to entitle him to reclaim that sum of L.446, as having been wrongfully received by the defender, and misapplied by him. Under the former action, it has been found that Mr Cullen did not purchase the shares belonging to Black, and which, through Mr Kerr, were transferred, and to payment of which, it is alleged, the L.446 were applied. If this was an unwarranted and wrongful act of the defender—beyond his powers and the limits of his employment—and unauthorised by the pursuer, which his averments on record plainly assert, there appears to be sufficient relevancy to support the pursuer's action to have the money repaid. Having rejected the shares, and the relation of seller and purchaser between him and Black no longer existing, the pursuer holds nothing for his money, and apparently it continues in the defender's hands without consideration. The defender's special grounds of defence will remain open to him; but, as the case is disclosed upon the pursuer's part of the record, the Lord Ordinary cannot but sustain the action and allow an issue.

“The case of the pursuer upon this record, to support the other conclusion of the summons, raises a question of some difficulty. The defender maintained that the fact of the pursuer, though assoilzied from the action at Black's instance, having been refused his expenses, implied misconduct as a litigant, or that the justice of the action was with his adversary; and that to entertain the claim in the present action would be to inquire into the grounds on which the Court had proceeded. But it was farther objected, that the pursuer had not set forth upon record any grounds to remove the presumption against him in having been refused expenses, though he obtained absolvitor, and that to support his present claim against Mr Kerr he was bound specially to connect him with the refusal of expenses, which had not been done. The Lord Ordinary has had some hesitation in pronouncing judgment on this conclusion of the action. He thinks, however, that it is a question for the Court, and that the claim would scarcely be suitable for the subject of an issue to go to a jury. He is humbly of opinion, that the pursuer has not stated any sufficient grounds to entitle him to payment of the costs of Black's action.”

The issues proposed by the pursuer were to this effect :—

No. 217.

1. Whether the defender, on the 15th of October 1847, purchased, or represented that he had purchased, 180 shares of the stock of the Great Northern Railway Company for L.446? and Whether, on or about the 6th November 1847, he wrongfully entered into a transaction with Alexander Black, by which he purchased from him, as if on the authority of the pursuer, a transfer of fifty shares of said stock, and wrongfully transmitted to the pursuer the said transfer, representing it to be a transfer of fifty shares purchased on the said 15th of October? and Whether litigation had resulted, in which the pursuer had incurred expenses to the amount of L.1500, by and through the wrongful conduct of the defender aforesaid? July 10, 1857.
Cullen v. Kerr.

2. Whether, on 6th November, the defender paid the said sum of L.446, on the false representation of the defender that the said sum was the price of shares purchased for the pursuer on the 15th October? and Whether the defender was resting-owing the said sum?

LORD PRESIDENT.—This case is in a very unsatisfactory shape for decision. It has been formerly before us, on one or other of its branches. At present it appears to stand in this way. Cullen says that he employed Kerr as a broker in 1847 to purchase certain shares of the Great Northern Railway for him; that Kerr purchased these shares on 15th October of that year, and notified the purchase; that some delay occurred in completing the transaction; but that at length in November Cullen wrote to the defender to say that he would send his clerk with the price on a certain day, and that unless the transfers were ready by that day he would exercise the option either of abandoning the transaction or buying other shares. The clerk went on that day. He paid the price, and the transfer was put into Cullen's hands. The transfer bears to be by Messrs Lindsay and Black. The title apparently is complete. Matters remained in that position for some time. A call was due, and Black being pressed for payment, began to move against Cullen, who having looked to the transfer, found that it was blank in some respects, and that Black, so far as he could understand, was not the party from whom he had made the purchase. The object of Black's action was to compel Cullen to register the shares, and relieve him of present and future calls upon the fifty shares sold by him. That led to a great deal of litigation. Cullen resisted Black's demand, and brought one of the actions of relief, now before us, against Kerr the broker, to relieve him of Black's claim. Cullen contended that he had had no transaction with Black; that he had nothing to do with the purchase on 6th November; that he had authorised purchases to be made in October, which were made, but that there his connection with the matter ceased. After judgment in this Court, and an appeal to the House of Lords, the case took the form of a certain adjustment of facts, amounting to a sort of special case, on which it was sent back to this Court, and on which we were called upon to pronounce judgment. We did so in favour of Cullen. We dealt with the case before us on the facts admitted by Black, and went not beyond the special case, if I may so call it, which was presented to us. The Court were not unanimous on the subject, and I expressed the difficulty which I had in dealing with the case on those special admissions, and excluding what I thought might be very important light on the matter.

Cullen now follows out the action against Kerr for relief from Black's claim, limited to the fifty shares. From the liabilities Black sought to attach to him, he has been already assoilzied; and he has brought a second action, which has been conjoined with the first. In it he also demands that Kerr shall pay him the expense incurred in resisting Black's attempt; and he now claims repayment of the L.446 paid for the shares in November 1847.

This action is presented to us in a way by no means satisfactory to my mind. In the first place, the record consists of inferences, and insinuations, and deductions, rather than of averments—and those upon points not material. But farther, it does not take up the whole case, and aver facts sufficient to enable us to deal with the whole interests of parties, for the specific allegations have reference to only 50 of the 180 shares. Then as to the demand for repayment of the L.446 paid for 180 shares, whereof 130 were said to be transferred by Lindsay, and only 50 by Black, the pursuer does not tell us what he is going to do with the shares, or what he has done with them. What has become of them? Is he to get back the money, and also keep

No. 217. the shares? For all that we know he may have already sold them. I think that — Mr Cullen has mistaken his remedy. He should have sought to set aside the whole July 10, 1857. transaction, and restore matters in integrum. I give no opinion, whether, after the Cullen v. interval of time he can do so, or whether Lindsay or Kerr would be entitled to object;
 Kerr. nor whether railway shares are all alike, or whether one set of shares is as good a tender as another? But, as the action stands, it is a demand for repayment of the price, without saying anything about the shares for which the price was paid. I am not disposed to sustain such an action upon such a statement.

In regard to the claim for expenses, it is impossible to deal with it separately, for the two questions are bound up together in this action; therefore I am disposed to give effect to the reclaiming note for the defender, and to refuse the reclaiming note for the pursuer.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—I come to the same result, and upon the same grounds.
 The pursuer asks payment of the purchase money, on the ground that it was paid by him sine causa. But he tells us in the record that he gave it in exchange for the transfer and scrip certificates. Is he to get back the money without returning that for which he paid it? There are no reductive conclusions, nor is there any offer to return the transfer. He cannot succeed in an action of condictio indebiti on that footing. Assuming that there had been the fraudulent concealment alleged, the remedy to which that would have entitled Cullen would have been not the action to which he has had recourse, but a reduction on the ground of fraudulent concealment and misrepresentation. I am quite clear that he has not made out a case for repetition; and I shall express no opinion as to what might be the merits of any other remedies if he had resorted to them. He has this difficulty to contend with, that he cannot allege that he purchased any particular shares, nor that there was any delectus personæ in the transaction. Therefore, whether concealment and misrepresentation could be established, remains open for consideration.

In regard to the pursuer's demand for payment of L.1500, as the expense of defending himself against Black, I think that your Lordship has arrived at a sound conclusion.

LORD DEAS.—I concur in the result arrived at by your Lordships. The new summons which was raised in May 1853 comprehends both branches of the pur-suer's claim. It concludes, 1st, for repetition of the L.446 paid in November 1847, as the price of the shares purchased on 15th October; 2d, For relief of the expenses incurred by the pursuer in the action at Black's instance, in which the pursuer was assolized, but no expenses were found due to him.

As regards the sum of L.446, the case stated by the pursuer is this:—He says that, in conformity with instructions, the defender bought for him, on 15th October 1847, 180 shares of the stock of the Great Northern Railway, at prices which amounted to the above sum;—that, on 6th November 1847, the pursuer received from the defender a transfer, by Messrs Lindsay and Black, of 180 shares of said stock, with relative certificates, and paid in exchange therefor the price of L.446;—
 that the pursuer afterwards discovered that other parties, and not Messrs Lindsay and Black, had been the sellers of the shares bought for him on 15th October; and upon these bare facts, which alone the pursuer proposes to put in issue, and retaining in his possession the certificates and transfer and without proposing to reduce either the transfer or the actual transaction which he alleges to have taken place on 15th October, he concludes for repetition of the L.446. The whole case, when so put, appears to me a non sequitur. The pleas in law and the issues proposed by the pursuer as the issues on which he stands, are alike insufficient to warrant the proposed result. Suppose all the facts embodied in the issues to be admitted, would it necessarily follow that, under the last of these issues, in which the gist of the whole lies, the defender was indebted and resting-owing to the pursuer in the L.446? I think not. The pursuer, in art. 4 of his condescendence (after having stated the prices in the previous article), says, "In this manner the purchase of 180 shares of the stock of the Great Northern Railway on the pursuer's account, was made and completed by the defender, on the 15th October 1847, in conformity to his instructions." And, in article 24, he says that, on 6th November.
 "he discovered from the defender's books, which the defender reluctantly showed, the names of the different parties from whom the defender had purchased the 180 shares, as communicated on the 15th October 1847." Well then, if this be so, let him demand to be furnished with a transfer from these other parties on giving up the transfer and certificates in his possession, and this will raise the question alluded to by your Lordship in the Chair, whether shares of stock are claimable as ear-marked, or whether one set of 180 shares is not as good a tender as another? But to hold the original purchase of 180 shares as well made and binding,—to retain the transfer and certificates applicable to the subsequent purchase of the same number of shares,—and, at the same time, per saltum, to demand back the whole price of L.446, appears to me to be totally out of the question.

No. 217.
—
July 10, 1857.
Cullen v.
Kerr.

Then, as regards the expenses of the action at Black's instance, it has been decided that Black could not enforce against the pursuer a sale of shares made to the defender on 6th November 1847, for the plain reason that the pursuer had given no mandate for that purchase. But, for the reasons stated by your Lordships, it does not follow that the defender is liable to the pursuer for the expenses incurred in that litigation. As yet it has not even been decided that the pursuer can refuse the same shares if tendered to him by the defender, and the pursuer has brought no action to try that question. The defender was no party to the action at Black's instance; and I think it a most material fact that, in that action, for reasons which we must here assume to have been sufficient, the pursuer was found not entitled to his expenses against the very party who, of all others, was most clearly liable for them, if the pursuer had been fairly entitled to indemnity.

LORD IVORY absent.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor submitted to review: Find that it is set forth by the pursuer on record, that on 15th October 1847, 180 shares of the stock of the Great Northern Railway Company were purchased for him by the defender, as broker, and that on 6th November 1847, he paid to the defender L.446, being the stipulated amount of the price of said shares, and that at the same time transfers in his favour to 180 shares of the stock of the said Company, and relative certificates, were delivered to him as in implement of said purchase, which transfer and certificates have been retained by him: Find that the pursuer now seeks repetition of said sum of L.446, on the ground that the shares mentioned in the said transfers were not the shares purchased for him on 15th October, but were other shares purchased on or about the 6th November, without his authority, and that he was induced to pay the said sum and to receive the said transfers and certificates in the belief that they had reference to the shares purchased for him on 15th October: Find that while in this action the pursuer demands repetition of the said sum of L.446, he does not seek to rescind or offer to relinquish the purchase made for him on 15th October, and does not seek to rescind or offer to relinquish or restore the transfers in his favour delivered to him of 6th November, and relative certificates: therefore, assoilzie the defender from the conclusions of both of the conjoined actions as laid, and decern: Find the defender entitled to the expenses incurred by him in each of these actions, as well as in the conjoined processes," &c.

JOHN CULLEN, W.S.—MORTON, WHITEHEAD, & GREIG, W.S.—Agents.

ROSE WALLS OR LENAGHAN AND OTHERS, Pursuers.—Logan—Mair.
THE MONKLAND IRON AND STEEL COMPANY, Defenders.—Penney—
A. B. Shand.

No. 218.

ALSO,

MARY BOYLE OR CALLAGHAN v. THE MONKLAND IRON AND STEEL COMPANY.

Process—Marriage—Legitimacy—Issue.—Held, by the Lord Justice-Clerk, that in an action of assythment by a person saying she was the widow of a deceased, when the defenders did not admit the marriage, it was incompetent to put in issue and prove before a jury a disputed marriage, and equally that children could not in that shape prove legitimacy.

No. 218. Process—Jury trial—Verdict—Ambiguity.—An issue was sent to a jury in an action of assythment, divided into three parts, which put the following queries:—
 July 10, 1857. (1), Whether a person deceased suffered severe bodily injury from an explosion in Lenaghan and a coal-pit; (2), Whether he suffered farther injury from undue detention at the Others v. pit-bottom; and (3), Whether the deceased's death was in consequence of these Monkland injuries. This verdict was returned,—“Find for the pursuers on both the first Iron and Steel Co. and second issues, by a majority of nine on the first issue, and by a majority of ten on the second issue, and assess the damages,” &c. On a motion for a new trial, Objections to the verdict—(1), as informal, in respect it treated what was really three parts of one issue as separate issues, and was neither a general verdict, nor contained an answer to the whole matters put in issue; (2), as ambiguous, in respect it did not appear whether the jury intended to return a verdict for the pursuers on the whole case; or, if they did, whether they proceeded on the ground of the death having been caused by the accident, on which the whole case depended,— repelled (diss. Lord Wood, abs. Lord Justice-Clerk).

2D DIVISION.
 Sheriff of Lanarkshire.
 R.

JAMES LENAGHAN, and Edward Boyle or Callaghan, two miners, were employed by the Monkland Iron and Steel Company to drive a mine from the bottom of a shaft to a seam of ironstone. Both having died, as was believed, in consequence of injuries received while in the defender's employment,—the widow and children of each raised an action in the Sheriff-court of Lanarkshire, concluding for damages and solatium against the defenders. The general averments in the two cases were the same, and both were advocated on interlocutors allowing proof.

The allegations were, that the deceased, in the usual course of their work, were let down the shaft to take the night shift at eight o'clock on the evening of the 23d March 1852: That while at work an explosion of fire-damp occurred, by which they were severely injured: That the whole woodwork of the mine being displaced, it was some time before they reached the bottom of the shaft: That the engineman heard the first signal to raise them about two o'clock in the morning: That he did not raise them to the pit-mouth, but went to Airdrie, distant about a mile and a-half or two miles, for assistance, though there were colliers' houses within ten minutes' walk: That Lenaghan and Callaghan were taken up, but not till about five in the morning; That they were wet, having been for sometime standing “up to the middle” in water at the pit-bottom; and that in consequence of the injuries so received they died three or four days afterwards. It was alleged that the mine was in a defective state, and that there was a want of sufficient workmen at the pit-head to raise the deceased when the signal to do so was given.

The issues adjusted and verdicts returned in the two cases were similar, and it was arranged that the same debate and proof should also be held to apply to both.

The following were the issues adjusted in the case of Lenaghan:—“It being admitted that the defenders are proprietors or lessees of a pit at or near Gartlee, near Airdrie, known by the name of Number Four Brownsburn Pit, and that they were in the occupation thereof during the year 1852:

“Whether, on or about the 23d or 24th March 1852, the said deceased James Lenaghan, when engaged in the service and employment of the defenders in forming or driving a stone mine, or road in the said pit, with the view of searching for ironstone on behalf of the defenders, sustained severe bodily injury, in consequence of an explosion of fire-damp in said pit, caused by the fault of the defenders? And,

“Whether the said deceased, after being injured as aforesaid, sustained further severe bodily injury from being detained for several hours at the bottom of the said pit, by reason of the person or persons in charge of the same, and of the engine and cage and apparatus connected therewith,—in neglect of the proper signal to raise the same, and of his or their duty.—

unduly delaying to raise the said deceased from the bottom of the said pit? No. 218.
And,

“Whether the death of the said deceased was occasioned by the said injuries, or by one or other of them, and by the fault of the defenders, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuers?”

July 10, 1857.
Lenaghan and
Others v.
Monkland
Iron and Steel
Co.

“Damages laid at L.1000 sterling.”

In the issues as originally approved by Lord Handyside, was one,—

“Whether the pursuer Mrs Rose Walls or Lenaghan is the widow, and the other pursuers, Thomas Lenaghan and Ellen Lenaghan, are the lawful children of the said deceased James Lenaghan.”

The case was set down for trial before the Lord Justice-Clerk, when, in consequence of the defenders refusing to admit that the pursuers stood in the relation of wife and children to the deceased, and the presiding Judge intimating an opinion that it was quite incompetent in such a form to try a question of marriage and legitimacy, the trial was put off to enable them to take such proceedings as were necessary to establish their relationships. Afterwards the defenders minuted an admission of the relationship alleged, and the case was tried before Lord Deas and a jury, when a verdict was returned for the pursuers, which was set aside as contrary to evidence, and a new trial granted. (See ante, p. 52).

The new trial took place at Glasgow on the 4th May 1857, Lord Handyside presiding.

The following verdict was returned:—“The jury, after having been kept inclosed in deliberation for upwards of six hours, say upon their oath, that in respect of the matters proven before them, they find for the pursuers;—on both the first and second issues, by a majority of nine on the first, and a majority of ten on the second; and assess the damages as follows, viz.: L.100 to Mrs Walls or Lenaghan, and to each of her children who may be under 15 years of age, L.50.”

The defenders now moved for a rule on the pursuers to shew cause why the verdict should not be set aside. In support of the motion it was urged that the verdict was informal; that it treated the different parts of what was one issue as if they were distinct issues; and, moreover, did not find that the death of the deceased, on which alone the claim for damages was founded, was caused by the accident, and that it was contrary to evidence. The rule was granted.

In support of the verdict it was argued;—Though a verdict might be in a certain sense inoperative as returned, it was within the jurisdiction of the Court to remedy any defects where there were materials for doing so; and it was the practice of the Court to put such a construction upon a verdict, where that could fairly be done, as would render it operative.¹ There was here clearly a general verdict for the pursuers. What followed that part of the verdict which expressed the general finding in their favour, was merely explanatory of the majority of the jury who considered the pursuers' case proven on the two branches of the issue, which the jury had by mistake conceived to be separate issues.² The evidence was minutely examined to shew that it fully warranted the verdict for the pursuers; and it was pleaded, that there were two concurrent verdicts for the pursuers, a fact that should have some weight in determining whether the verdict was contrary to evidence.

To which it was answered;—The jury had been clearly mistaken as to the nature of the issue, and the result was a verdict not only ambiguous, but

¹ Lawson v. North British Railway Co., 16th July 1850, ante, vol. xii. p. 1250.

² Railton v. Mathews, 11th March 1846, ante, vol. viii. p. 747; Macaulay v. Buist and Co., 9th Dec. 1846, ante, vol. ix. p. 245; Melrose v. Hastie and Co., 7th March 1851, ante, vol. xiii. p. 880; Swimmerton v. Marquis of Stafford, 9th Nov. 1810, iii. Taunton, p. 231; ii. Tidd's Practice, p. 908.

No. 218. which left the case in inextricable confusion. There was nothing in the verdict from which it could be inferred that the intention of the jury was to return a general verdict for the pursuers. It was more reasonable to suppose that the jury held that the deceased had sustained severe bodily injuries from the explosion and from the delay in raising them to pit-head, but not that their death was the result of these injuries.

July 10, 1857.
Lenaghan and
Others v.
Monkland
Iron and Steel
Co.

The Court made avizandum. At advising,—

LORD MURRAY.—It was strongly urged by the defenders that the verdict in this case is ambiguous, and that, therefore, on that ground alone, it ought to be set aside and a new trial granted. On this question I have no difficulty. It appears to me perfectly clear what the jury intended to find; and further, that they have expressed that intention in terms to which the Court is bound to give effect.

There is printed on page 45 of the appendix, what are termed “Issues” in Lenaghan’s case. These must have been before the jury in the same terms as they are printed and laid before us, and must be considered as the foundation of the verdict. They commence with an admission, that the defenders are proprietors of a pit near Gartlee, in the neighbourhood of Airdrie, and that they were in the occupation of that pit in 1852. Then follow three paragraphs, each of them commencing with “Whether,” and which are, though printed separately, bound together with the conjunction “and.” I must hold that the verdict refers to those as the issues which were placed before the jury. The verdict differs from what usually occurs, by the jury having differed in opinion, and having prolonged their deliberations for upwards of six hours; and then they determined on what the jury call the first and second issues by a majority of votes, and after having done so, assessed the damages. Suppose that the jury had not been divided on two matters, which they called the first and second issues. Would there then be any ambiguity in the verdict? The verdict would then have been in these terms:—

“A jury having been impannelled and sworn to try the issues between the said parties, the jury say upon their oath, that, in respect of the matters proved before them, they find for the pursuers on both the first and second issues, and assess the damages as follows.”

Could anybody say that that would have been a doubtful or ambiguous verdict? It would have been a verdict entirely for the pursuers on the first and second issues; and it seems to me equally for the pursuers upon the matter whether the death of the deceased was occasioned by the said injuries, to the loss, injury and damage of the pursuers. The assessment of the damage is certainly an affirmation of the third issue, that the death of the deceased was occasioned by the fault of the defenders to the loss of the pursuers. If that is the necessary result of the verdict, omitting the passage relating to the difference of opinion and subsequent vote of the jury, it does not appear to me that the most special consideration of the issues and verdict throw any doubt on the matter, but, on the contrary, explain why the verdict should be special as to what the jury termed the two issues, and more general or less special as to the conclusion and assessment of damages. The first is in these terms—(reads it.)

No person can be surprised, after reading the evidence, at the jury having differed on that subject; and, at any rate, it is certain that they found each of what they term the first and second issues matter of great difficulty; the majority, as the verdict bears, after deliberating for six hours, consisted of nine. The verdict on what the jury termed the second issue is in these terms—(reads it.) On that the majority are ten. No person can say that the evidence is so clear as to make it any way surprising that the jury should have deliberated long upon it, and have been obliged at last to come to a division on the subject. But supposing these two matters settled by the votes the jury came to, there is no reason to suppose that there was any difference of opinion as to the result. Unless the Court is authorised to hold it to be absolutely necessary that the verdict should have contained an assent to what was almost matter of necessary deduction from what the jury had found on the other two points, it appears to me that the jury, by assessing the damages, fully conveyed their assent to that almost necessary inference from what they had previously settled. It might have been more complete, but I think it is hardly possible for any person who reads the proceedings, to have any doubt that the jury, differing as they had done on other matters, had no difference on this, and assessed the damage as a consequence of what they had found after much difference of opinion. No. 218.

July 10, 1857.

Lenaghan and Others v.

Monkland

Iron and Steel

Co.

It usually happens, that where certain matters are attended with much difficulty, and have been much debated, discussed, and at length finally settled, and what remains does not seem to admit of doubt, it is passed over somewhat hastily, and only what seems essential is expressed. They might have considered it as a third issue, and following out the previous arrangement, and therefore on the third issue find for the pursuers, and assess the damages. That would have made the verdict most formal and complete; but as the third issue was framed so as to admit of being applied to either of the previous issues, and the jury had come at length to affirm both, I do not believe that they thought they had anything more to do than to assess the damages. The death of the party soon after the facts which were made the subject of these two issues, was the only undisputed point in the cause; and as what may be called the third issue was so framed as to make the damages refer to a finding on either point, after the jury had found both, they appear to have had no doubt, and there was not room for any difference of opinion, except as to the amount of damages, on which there appears to have been none.

I am unable to surmise that the jury had any difficulty there, or considered it necessary to do more than express their opinion by assessing the damages.

If this is held to make the verdict doubtful, it may give rise to a great many questions with regard to future verdicts.

I am far, however, from holding that the evidence in this case on both the points on which the jury differed, and determined by majorities, was not attended with very great difficulty—and it was certainly a case on which it is no way strange that some of the jury did not agree with the majority;—but it must be recollected that this is the second verdict of a jury to the same effect.

The case has been tried without any exception being taken to the law as laid down by the Judge, and he was not asked to state anything to the jury, in addition to the observations he made on the evidence. The defenders might, if they had thought fit, have desired the Judge who tried the case to state to the jury, that the evidence on either or both of these two issues was entirely in favour of the defenders, and that there was no evidence adduced by the pursuers to establish either of these two issues, which the jury ought to take into consideration; but nothing of the sort appears to have taken place. The Court must therefore hold that the case was heard to the satisfaction of both parties, and that the Judge who tried the case held there was evidence on these matters of fact which the jury were entitled to consider, and make the subject of their verdict. It would be a very strong thing, indeed, to set aside a verdict in these circumstances, and award a third trial.

I do not conceive it any part of my duty to attempt to place myself in the position of a juror in this case, and say whether, if I had been in the jury-box, I should have been in the majority or minority in the division which took place. It is no necessary duty on the part of a judge to do so. It might be considered as trespassing upon the proper functions of the jury. It is the duty of the judge to state the law, and to see that the case is duly tried, but it is the peculiar province of the jury to ascertain the facts—De jure respondent judices, de facto jurati.

I may, however, be permitted to observe, that persons in the situation of the defenders, who make contracts relative to coal and other mines, where such accidents as are the subject of this trial may occur, have a very important duty to perform. It is very important that all agreements (which, for that matter, might be printed and filled up) should make it perfectly clear what are the responsibilities which they respectively incur.

This may surely be done, and might prevent many questions. It may make the contractors and workmen more prudent and cautious, and by making them so, may be the means of saving many lives, and preventing many litigations.

No person can read the agreement between Harty and Lenaghan and Mr Dundas and Son, without being of opinion that it might have been made more clear, and have pointed out to Harty and Lenaghan the responsibilities that they were or were not to incur during their contract.

That is a very important matter, and worthy of the consideration of those

No. 218. respectable persons who have coal and other mines in Scotland; and they are called upon, both from considerations of humanity and, I may add, personal interest, to direct their attention to the subject.

July 10, 1857.

Lenaghan and Others v.

Monkland

Iron and Steel

Co.

LORD COWAN.—The defenders, in support of their motion for a new trial, maintain—1st, That the verdict is essentially defective; and, 2d, That it is contrary to evidence.

On the first of these points, the terms of the issue sent to trial afford the materials for judging of the sufficiency of the verdict. Substantially, the matters embraced by what are called “the issues,” although in the form of distinct questions, truly constitute but one issue. And the case was so dealt with in the argument submitted to the Court.

The first question in the issue relates to the injury sustained by the deceased, in consequence of explosion of fire-damp, caused by the fault of the defenders; and the second question in the issue relates to the further severe injury sustained by the deceased, from his being detained for several hours at the bottom of the pit, through the neglect or undue delay of the person in charge of the pit, and the machinery therewith connected. These two questions embrace the negligence and culpa charged on, causing the injuries to the deceased, from both or one or other of which, through the fault of the defenders, death proceeded. And the third question in the issue, accordingly, is, “whether the death of the said deceased was occasioned by the said injuries, or by one or other of them, and by the fault of the defenders, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuers?”

These several questions are run into each other, and connected together, so as to form the issue which the jury had to try.

There can be no doubt that a verdict generally on the issue for the pursuers, accompanied by an assessment of damages, would have been unobjectionable. The jury were under no necessity of finding specifically upon each of the questions embraced in the issue, although in deliberating on the evidence with a view to their verdict, they behoved carefully to have every part of the issue under their attentive consideration.

The verdict returned was—“The jury, after having been kept enclosed in deliberation for upwards of six hours, say upon their oath, that, in respect of the matters proven before them, they find for the pursuers on both the first and second issues by a majority of nine on the first, and a majority of ten on the second; and assess the damages as follows,” &c.

This seems to me, in substance and effect, to be a finding for the pursuers on the whole matters embraced in the issue.

There is no set form of expression in which the jury are required to return their verdict; but if its meaning be clear and free of ambiguity, any departure from mere technical accuracy of expression will be overlooked. The case of Lawson, 16th July 1850, referred to in the discussion, affords a strong illustration of this proposition. And for my part, in reading the issues and the verdict in this case, I have no doubt as to the meaning of the jury. I think their verdict was intended to embrace, and does embrace, the whole matters of fact in issue, by the finding for the pursuers, and the consequent assessment of damages; and entertaining this conviction, I do not feel myself entitled to hold it ineffectual.

In construing the verdict it is material to keep in view what is certified to the Court by the Judge who presided at the trial, as to the manner in which the verdict was received and recorded by the clerk of Court. The notes state—“The jury retired at half-past 11 P.M.; they returned into Court after the lapse of an hour, and were told they must continue in deliberation for six hours, when a majority of nine to three, not less, may give a verdict.” And it is then stated—I presume as the admission of both parties—that the verdict was received by the clerk after the lapse of the statutory period, in presence of the agents for the parties. The statute by which this proceeding is regulated is the 17 & 18 Vict., c. 59; and the verdict, in the terms in which we find it, was returned by the jury, and received and recorded by the clerk without objection, as an answer to the whole issue.

Now it appears to me, that the introduction into the verdict, between the finding for the pursuers and the assessment of the damages, of the intermediate words, is accounted for by the necessity thought to exist, if not actually existing, that the verdict should set forth, in terms of the statute, the majority by which the matters in issue were found for the pursuers. The words employed by the jury, and received by the clerk in recording the verdict, although awkwardly introduced, ought, I think, in justice to the pursuers, and in consonance with what I cannot but hold to have been the true intent and meaning of the jury, to be so read.

But further, and after all, when the jury found for the pursuers on both of the leading subjects of inquiry, they did, in substance and effect, find that the injuries, and subsequent death of the deceased, did result from both of the grounds, in respect of which negligence and fault were charged against the defenders, and in respect of which damages were claimed by the pursuers and awarded by the verdict.

And finally, when the jury, having found for the pursuers on the leading matters for their consideration on the evidence, and on which the liability of the defenders depended, proceed to assess the damages, I consider that they must be held in their finding to have had in view, and to have found, that both of the injuries, for which they held the defenders liable in damages, had, through their fault, caused the death. The last matter put in issue, or what was termed in the argument the third question, is truly the mere sequence of the other two questions; and when these were both found for the pursuers, there remained nothing for the jury to return under this head of the issue, but an assessment for damages. It would have been very different had there been a finding for the defenders upon either of the preceding questions. Whether the death arose from that one cause of injury, for which, in that view, the defenders had alone to answer, might require to have been substantially found as the ground for assessing damages. But when the whole preceding matters in issue were found generally for the pursuers, this, in my view, carried with it inherently an answer to the latter part of the issue, and its legitimate result was the assessment of damages.

Although, therefore, I cannot but feel the question to be attended with some nicety and difficulty—and this the more from being aware of my brother Lord Wood's views—I do not think that on this immaterial ground the defenders ought to prevail in their motion for a new trial.

The second ground urged by the defenders in support of their motion is, that the verdict is contrary to evidence.

The argument submitted to the Court by the counsel for the defenders made a great impression on my mind, especially in reference to the first branch of the issue, and had this been the first motion for a new trial I might have been inclined to yield to that impression; but that is not the case, as the result of the motion, if granted, must be a third trial. After carefully considering the evidence and the argument, it is impossible for me to hold that there was not, on both of the leading questions which the jury had to try, evidence of greater or less weight, the effect of which it was for the jury to determine. On the first trial, Lord Deas presiding, the jury found on the evidence for the pursuers. The Court set aside the verdict as contrary to evidence, considering that the defenders were entitled upon that ground to have the case submitted of new to a jury. But the second trial, Lord Handyside presiding, has issued in a similar verdict, and we are again asked to set it aside, and to send the case a third time for trial on the same ground, of the verdict being contrary to evidence. I concur with your Lordship in thinking that we cannot do so without incurring the charge of attempting to interfere with what is properly the province of the jury. They are the competent judges, and have twice had the case upon the evidence before them, and have decided it. Unless there had been something approaching to an absolute negation of evidence to support the verdict, which, meagre as the case may be, cannot with any propriety be said to be so here, I do not think the Court would be justified in finding that the case should be re-mitted to be tried a third time.

I am therefore of opinion that the rule ought to be discharged, and the motion for a new trial refused.

LORD WOOD.—Upon the motion for a new trial, on the ground of the verdict being contrary to evidence, I have nothing to add. I can hardly say that, as a jurymen, I should have been prepared to arrive at the same result as the jury has done. My difficulty would have been more particularly great in finding for the pursuers upon the first branch of the issue. But, having regard to the evidence that was laid before the jury on either side, I think that, for the reasons that have already been so fully stated by your Lordship, the verdict of the jury ought not

No. 218.

July 10, 1857.
Lenaghan and
Others v.
Monkland
Iron and Steel
Co.

No. 218. to be disturbed, and a new trial granted, in respect of its being contrary to the evidence laid before them,—the true import and effect of which, as establishing or not the facts put in issue, it was their peculiar province to determine.
 July 10, 1857. But I regret to say that I do not find myself enabled to concur in the opinion of Lenaghan and your Lordships in regard to the objections taken by the defenders to the verdict, as Others v. Monkland not being a good and valid verdict in the cause the jury had to try. It is certainly Iron and Steel with great diffidence that I differ from your Lordships. But doing so, I think it
 Co. right, shortly, to state the grounds on which my own opinion rests.

It seemed to be agreed at the debate by the counsel on both sides, that although the questions put to the jury are headed by the title issues, and although what follows the admission is divided into three parts, each containing distinct questions, they were treated at the trial as forming one issue, consisting of three branches, and it was stated by the counsel for the defenders that they were willing to take the objection to the verdict upon that footing, which was considered the most favourable one for the pursuers on which it could be presented. Looking to the course of the argument, this perhaps, does not involve any very material concession.

As the case comes before us at present, the only matter to be considered is, whether or not the verdict, as it stands, is a good verdict, or whether or not it is a bad verdict, from ambiguity, or other more absolute defect,—any question as to the competency of amending the verdict, from such materials as the proceedings may supply, so as to remove any objection on the ground of ambiguity, or uncertainty or otherwise, on the authority of the cases of Marianski and Morgan, is not legis loci.

If one were to judge from the terms of the verdict, it would rather appear that the jury had thought they had three separate issues to deal with; but passing that, it is clear that, holding it to be one issue, the jury responded to it as an issue divided into parts or branches; and, accordingly, whatever may be found to be its sound construction, they do in their verdict give a specific answer to the two first branches of it, while, in so far as regards any specific return, no answer whatever is made by them to the third.

Now, it is not, and cannot be disputed, that the matter put to the jury, in the third branch of the issue, is of the essence of the case, inasmuch as, unless the verdict can be so read or construed as to import a finding upon it for the pursuers, no damages could be legally assessed or awarded to them. Indeed, this is not only admitted by the pursuers, but is one of the grounds on which their argument in support of the sufficiency of the verdict was founded.

I entirely agree with your Lordships, that the learned Judge who presided must be held to have given every assistance to the jury which the case required. No exception is taken, either to the law which his Lordship may have thought it necessary to lay down, or to his not having given any direction, in point of law, which he ought to have given, or was required to give; and therefore I think it may be assumed that the jury were told, that unless the third branch of the issue was proved to their satisfaction, by the evidence adduced, they could not find the pursuers entitled to damages.

But still it appears to me, that although the jury have, by their verdict, assessed the damages at the sums set forth therein, there is neither in that circumstance, nor in any other view which can be taken of the verdict, enough to support it as a good verdict in the cause.

That a verdict for the pursuers generally, without any reference to the particular parts of the issue, would have been a good verdict, is clear. But as the verdict is framed, I hold that, without a straining of its terms, in a manner which I hold to be entirely inadmissible, I am of opinion that it is impossible to read it as finding, in the first instance, a general verdict for the pursuers on the whole issues. I cannot read the verdict as having a stop in the finding at the word pursuers, and that what follows is introduced only as explanatory of the numbers by which the jury had so found upon the first and second branches of it. I think it beyond all doubt clear, that what the jury do by their verdict, as expressed, is, "in respect of the matters proven before them, to find for the pursuers on both the first and second issues"—that it is to this, as the finding of the jury, that the explanation is added; that in so finding it was by a majority of nine on the first, and a majority of two on the second—the immediately preceding words, "on both the first and second issues," forming no part of the explanation, but an integral part of the finding itself. No. 218.

But rejecting that reading of the verdict, it comes to be a verdict with a positive finding by the jury on the first and second branches of the issue, and no finding, in positive words, at least, upon the third; and that being the case, I confess I am unable to see how the verdict can be construed as nevertheless containing a finding upon the third, which is an essential branch of the issue. I am unable to satisfy myself that the issue can be read so as to hold the third branch substantially a part of each of the preceding ones, or, as it were, to work it into them, in respect of the matters they embrace not inferring any consequence or result of themselves, but requiring the third to make up the complement necessary to any operative result in favour of the pursuers, and in that way to hold that a verdict finding for the pursuers on the first and second branches of the issue may be construed as truly a verdict upon the third also, and as thereby exhausting the whole issue. I cannot inferentially so supply what is not in words to be found in the verdict, which, as framed, does in its terms explicitly apply the finding it contains to the first and second branches of the issue alone. It may be that the finding thus limited will be inoperative—that so construing it, the assessment of damages which follows is rendered nugatory. It may be that the jury intended to find for the pursuers on the third branch of the issue, or thought that by the verdict they returned they had done so. But this, after all, resolves into a speculation upon the views of the jury, no certainty as to which can be derived from the terms of the verdict itself. It may be thought improbable that they assessed damages irrespective of being satisfied that the matter put separately in issue in the third branch of the issue had been proved; but it is by no means impossible that they did so, and that it was not their intention to find for the pursuers on the third branch of the issue, for it does not follow that a jury are always guided in what they do by the direction of the Judge. And if the jury did in fact intend to find for the pursuers, to the effect of assessing damages without finding for them upon the third branch of the issue, I can hardly figure any terms upon which, in that view, they could more appropriately have expressed their verdict, or more clearly have conveyed their meaning, unless, indeed, they had in so many words stated that they did not find for the pursuers on the third branch, or that upon it they found for the defenders. Now that being the case, and although there were difficulty in supposing that the jury did not intend to find for the pursuers on the third branch of the issue, I cannot assume that they did not, and so raise the verdict into one giving a certain and clear response to the whole issue. Or again, supposing that the intention of the jury really was to find for the pursuers on the third branch of the issue, and that they thought they had done so (but of which, taking the verdict as it is worded, there can, I conceive, be no certainty), then there was, it appears to me, an omission—an unintentional one, it may be—in expressing the opinion they entertained, but an omission which, as the case comes before us at present, cannot be supplied, so as thereby to warrant the at once sustaining the verdict as a good verdict, liable to no objection in respect of ambiguity or non-exhaustion of the issue the jury had to try, and more particularly in respect of its having failed, reading it as it stands, to make a return upon the third and essential branch of it.

I abstain from going further into the matter. The views I entertain can be of no importance to its decision, and I am sensible that they can be entitled to very little weight in themselves, seeing that they are opposed to those of your Lordships.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK absent.

THE COURT discharged the rule.

DAVID MANSON, S.S.C.—JOHN ROSS, S.S.C.—Agents.

SIR THOMAS BLAIKIE, Knt. Pursuer.—Macfarlane—Fraser.

JOHN DUNCAN, Defender.—Penney—Moir.

No. 219.

Process—Jury trial—Slander—Diligence where no issue in justification—Provocation.—A director of a bank brought an action of damages for slander against the writer of a letter reflecting on members of the committee of management, of

No. 219. which he was one: An issue was adjusted, in which this letter was innuendoed as calumniously representing that the members of the committee had been in 1856 guilty of malpractices similar to others which had caused great loss and damage to the bank and shareholders in 1846;—Held (abs. Lord Ivory), that the defender was not entitled to a diligence in terms of a specification seeking access to the books and correspondence of the bank for a period of ten years, in order (1) to prove the character of the proceedings in 1846, the pursuer having in his record given a description of them, admitted by the defender in his answers to be correct; nor (2) to prove the nature of those in 1856, in mitigation of damages, no issue in justification having been taken;—Held, also, that he was not entitled, with a view to prove provocation, to a diligence to recover letters which he did not aver, had been written, but that he had “reason to believe” had been written by directors of the bank.

1st Division.
Ld. Ardmillan.
C.

SEE supra, p. 881.

Sir Thomas Blaikie was one of the directors of the North of Scotland Banking Company, who brought actions of damages against Duncan for defamation, as stated above, both individually and in name of the bank. In the action at Blaikie's instance on 4th July, the following issues were of consent approved of:—

“Whether the defender printed and published, or caused to be printed and published, in the ‘Aberdeen Free Press, Peterhead, Fraserburgh, and Buchan News, and North of Scotland Advertiser,’ of Friday, 23d January 1857, and also in the ‘Northern Advertiser,’ of 27th January 1857, or either of these newspapers, a communication in the form of a letter, addressed by him to ‘the Shareholders of the Aberdeen, Peterhead, and Fraserburgh Railway,’ in which, with reference to an Act of Parliament which a railway company was then seeking to obtain, he among other things made the following statements:”—(Here the letter, quoted supra, pp. 882–3, was inserted.)

“And whether the said statements, or any part thereof, are of and concerning the pursuer, and falsely and calumniously represent and assert that, through the reckless and improper connivance of the pursuer, and of other directors and members of the Committee of Management of the North of Scotland Bank, some of their number had been allowed to put their hands into the bank till, and take away or transfer any sum they chose, to Mr Robert Milne, the secretary of the Great North of Scotland Railway Company; that, in point of fact, large sums had been so taken away or transferred; that the bank held no security for the sums so taken away or transferred; that the money so taken away or transferred was substantially of the nature of a payment by the pursuer, and other members of the committee of management of the bank, or some of them, to themselves; that the pursuer, as one of the committee of management of said bank at the date of instituting this action, had been guilty of such a juggle, or had indulged in such mal-practices as those which had some years previously caused great loss to the shareholders of the said bank, and had affected its character, credit, and reputation; to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer?”

The case now came before the Court, on the defender's motion for a diligence, in terms of the following specification:—“1. All books of the North of Scotland Banking Company, containing entries tending to shew the state of the accounts between the bank and the several directors who were in office in 1845 and 1846, as well as Henry Paterson, the manager thereof,—whether as individuals, or as joint obligants with each other, or with other parties, from the commencement of the year 1846, to the date of raising the present action, that excerpts of such entries may be taken, and certified by the commissioner. 2. All books of the said bank containing entries tending to shew the bills granted by the said parties, or any of them, for advances

No. 219.

July 11, 1857.
 Blaikie v.
 Duncan.

made by the bank to them, or any of them, and that for the period foresaid, that excerpts of such entries may be taken, and certified by the commissioner. 3. All reports, and failing recovery of the principals, then copies thereof, by the directors of the said bank to the shareholders thereof, in the year 1847, and since, having reference to the loss of the capital, the discharge of the said Henry Paterson, and the list of debts contracted to the bank by the several parties referred to in article 1st of this specification. 4. The proposal or proposals, and failing recovery of the principals, then copies thereof, submitted by the pursuer to the said bank, or to the Northern Insurance Company, as to the settlement of and security to be given for a joint obligation by him and others for a debt due to the said bank and insurance company, and contracted in or prior to 1846. 5. The register of shareholders of the Great North of Scotland Railway Company, and all other books of the said company, containing entries tending to shew the number of shares held by the said bank, or by any persons who were at the time directors thereof, during the period from the commencement of the year 1845 to the date of raising the present action, with the dates of transfer of the said shares, the names and designations of the parties to whom they were transferred, the amounts of subscription or calls paid thereon, and the dates of forfeiture of such part thereof as was forfeited, that excerpts of such entries may be taken, and certified by the commissioner. 6. All books of the said railway company containing entries tending to shew the names of the directors thereof during each of the years referred to in the preceding article hereof, that excerpts of such entries may be taken, and certified as aforesaid. 7. The minute-book, or minutes of meetings of the directors and shareholders of the said railway company, that excerpts may be taken therefrom, and certified as aforesaid, of all entries in regard to the forfeiture of any of the shares referred to in the 5th article hereof, and of the sederunts of the meetings, shewing the parties actually present. 8. All books of the said bank containing entries in reference to applications for money made by or on behalf of the promoters of the scheme termed the Formartine and Buchan Railway, in or about the month of January 1857, the sums thereupon advanced by the bank, and the securities granted therefor, that excerpts of such entries may be taken, and certified as aforesaid. 9. All books of the said bank containing similar entries in reference to the scheme termed the Denburn Branch of the Great North of Scotland Railway Company, that excerpts of such entries may be taken and certified as aforesaid. 10. The minute-book and other books of the said Formartine and Buchan Railway Company, or the promoters thereof, having reference to correspondence between them, or any party or parties on their behalf, and the said North of Scotland Bank, the National Bank of Scotland, and other banks carrying on business in Scotland, for obtaining advances, in order to make the deposits of money required by the standing orders of Parliament to be made in reference to said undertaking, that excerpts of all entries therein, having reference to such correspondence, may be made and certified by the commissioner. 11. All letters, accounts, bills and obligations, in reference to loan transactions, in or about December 1856 and January 1857, to which the pursuer and the other promoters of the Denburn Branch of the Great North of Scotland Railway, and of the Formartine and Buchan Railway, or one or more of them, were parties,—applicable to the deposits required by the standing orders of Parliament for these schemes respectively. 12. All letters, or copies of letters, by any of the promoters or others on behalf of the Formartine or Buchan Railway, or of the Great North of Scotland Railway, or of the promoters of either of these schemes, to the Bank of Scotland, the Union Bank of Scotland, the Commercial Bank, and the National Bank, tending or calculated to prevent any support being given to the Aberdeen, Peterhead, and Fraserburgh Railway. 13. All newspapers,

No. 219.
 —
 July 11, 1857.
 Blaikie v.
 Duncan.

or copies of newspapers, called the 'London Railway Times,' and the 'Aberdeen Herald,' transmitted by post from Aberdeen, in the month of January 1857, to all or any of the said banks, or to any of the leading officials therein."

The pursuer objected to this diligence. He pleaded, that no issue in justification had been taken; and if a diligence so sweeping were granted, the result would be that a party having a sinister object in view, might, by publishing a slander, and not taking an issue in justification, get into an inquiry which would otherwise have been incompetent, and obtain access to private repositories and muniments, to the still greater injury, it might be, of the parties, than that occasioned by the slander. The Court would not grant a diligence to recover evidence which could not be used at the trial, nor would they needlessly expose the private affairs of banks and railway companies to the world. The case of *M'Neill v. Rorison*¹ was a direct authority against allowing an attempt to prove the truth of a libel without an issue in justification.

Pleaded for the defender;—In order to prove the incompetency of the diligence, the pursuer must shew that by no possibility could the documents sought to be recovered be made evidence in the cause. The sting of the libel consisted in the character of the transaction in 1846, to which these proceedings in 1856 were likened. The character of the calumny was described by the pursuer himself, who admitted malpractices in 1846, and therefore it was competent for the defender to explain to the jury what really was the nature of the transaction in 1846, and that he did not make the statements recklessly, but with some cause or excuse. The general rule was quite clear.² It was quite competent to prove circumstances which might mitigate damages, although no issue in justification had been taken. The pursuer's own statement necessarily led to such an inquiry as the defender now proposed to enter into. Farther, it was a material consideration whether the defender's statement was a complete fiction, or whether there was just cause for it. It must be found that what took place in 1846 was flagrantly irrelevant to this action, before the Court could refuse this diligence. A second class of documents sought to be recovered related to the transaction of 1856; and a third class, which might be taken in connection with it, related to what might be called the provocations of the case, which it was competent and relevant to prove at the trial, for the purpose of fixing the proper character of the defamation. It might not go the length of justification in the legal sense; but it was of some consequence whether the defender's statements were correct or not, or whether they were an invention intended to injure this railway, and all connected with it. This was a question of moral wrong, and everything that might palliate it diminished the culpability, and thereby the amount of damages.³

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question raised here is of considerable importance, not only in regard to this case, but as determining the course which the Court are to adopt in regard to other cases of a similar nature. This action is brought for alleged slander contained in a letter printed in certain newspapers in January 1857, and which is quoted in the issue. Now, as I understand this letter, it alludes to a thing said to have taken place in 1857; and one of the main points of this alleged slander is, that it represents the pursuer and other members of the committee of management of the North of Scotland Banking Company to have been guilty of such a juggle as had previously caused great loss to the shareholders of the bank. The expression "some years previously," used in the pursuer's issue, has reference, apparently, from the record, to the year 1846, and the calumny is said to be that this pursuer and the other members of the committee of management of this bank are alleged to have acted in a way that is parallel to what was done in 1846. The pursuer complains of that as being a very grievous accusation, because what was done in 1846 was very bad. He tells us in his record what it was,¹ and of course the worse it was, the more grievous the accusation.

¹ M'Neill v. Rorison, 12th Nov. 1847, ante, vol. x. p. 15.

² Macfarlane on Issues, p. 220; Ogilvie v. Scott, 19th March 1836, 14 S. & D. vol. xiv. p. 729.

³ Ogilvie v. Scott, 19th March 1836, 14 S. & D. p. 729.

No. 219.
—
July 11, 1857.
Blaikie v.
Duncan.

The only answer by the defender to that statement seems to be substantially an admission of what the pursuer alleges took place in 1846. The defender's own statement charges the pursuer with being one of the parties concerned in that mismanagement, and sets forth that the mismanagement consisted particularly in advancing large sums of bank money to the North of Scotland Railway Company, without adequate security.² It is a direct statement of misconduct on the part of the pursuer in 1846, in addition to any misconduct imputed to him in 1856. But the defender takes no issue in justification; he undertakes neither to prove that the pursuer was a party to any mismanagement in 1846, nor that he was a party to any mismanagement in 1856. He stands on the general defence, and he now asks a diligence to support it. The first thing he proposes to do is to investigate the affairs of the bank in 1846, and he calls for the books and correspondence of the bank in the most general and unlimited terms. His object, we are told, is to shew the participation of the pursuer in the proceedings of 1846, and thereby to mitigate the damages. By proving the character of the proceedings in 1846, while he is not to attempt to justify his slander, he wishes to palliate it, so that in estimating the damages he may be dealt leniently with.

I do not think the defender is entitled to this diligence. The proceedings in 1846 are not the subject of the libel, and the proposal here is to involve the pursuer in something else, which itself might have been the subject of another action of damages. The pursuer describes these proceedings. The defender admits the character of them, and now says, I want to get into these proceedings, in order to shew that you were as bad in 1846 as you are in 1857. That is wholly out of the question in this case. There is no issue taken as to libel upon the pursuer for anything done in 1846. Farther, the inquiry proposed here is of the broadest kind, and I should doubt much whether, under any allegation as to the nature of the proceedings of 1846, the defender could get into such an inquiry. It embraces the whole proceedings of that period. If one party chooses to libel another, by comparing his actings now to the actings of other parties at another time, according to the defender's view, that might be made an excuse for diligence to drag to light the whole proceedings of these other parties. That is an abuse of diligence, and I am quite opposed to granting it.

What follows in the specification falls within the same rule. The calls cannot be granted. They are of that sweeping character that we must refuse them. It is an attempt to ransack matters which have not been put forward in the only shape which could constitute them a defence to this action.

The articles of the specification which refer to the proceedings in 1857 are more to the point. These proceedings are the immediate subject of the action. The complaint is that the directors are accused of having allowed the money of the bank to be taken away recklessly, and put into the possession of the secretary of the Great North of Scotland Railway Company, without obtaining from the Company any security, and that these operations were of the nature of a payment to the directors themselves. That is the subject-matter of the libel,—and that the directors have done it to such an extent that their proceedings are like those of 1846. This diligence is asked for in order to obtain evidence of a statement which is of the essence of the libel, and as to which the defender has made averments, but still he has not taken an issue of justification, and I do not understand the principle of M'Neill and Rorison if it does not reach this case.

In conclusion, the defender calls for all letters by any of the promoters or others on behalf of the Formartine and Buchan Railway, or of the Great North of Scotland Railway, or of the promoters of either of these schemes to various specified banks calculated to prevent any support being given to the Aberdeen, Peterhead, and Fraserburgh Railway. Now on that subject the defender has made the following statement in article 3 of his condescendence in the present action. He says that in the course of the Parliamentary contests between the "rival schemes much

¹ Vide supra, p. 881, art. 3.

² Vide supra, p. 884.

No. 219. excitement was created, and the credit and financial arrangements of each were unceremoniously handled, both in the form of newspaper warfare and otherwise. July 11, 1857. In particular, the nature and bona fide character of the subscriptions to the Aberdeen, Peterhead, and Fraserburgh line were most unfairly assailed in a series of articles in those newspapers, which were under the influence of the Great North of Scotland Railway, of which by this time the pursuer had become a director, as well as of the Formartine and Buchan line; and, in addition to this, attempts were made to injure its credit, and cripple its financial means, by private letters and by articles in newspapers, containing injurious statements against the scheme and its projectors or supporters, which were industriously circulated among the different banks in Edinburgh and other quarters;—and which represented its deposits as delusive, or obtained by unfair means. These attacks, both public and private, which had been perseveringly continued, and which the defender had every reason to believe emanated from the Great North of Scotland Railway and the promoters of the rival branch, naturally led the defender to inquire in what way the deposits for the rival scheme had been obtained, and to bring this matter before the shareholders of the Aberdeen, Peterhead, and Fraserburgh line, in the letter which forms the subject of the present action. The letter itself bears this as the explanation of its being written.”

Blaikie v.
Duncan.

Now this is put forward as a sort of provocation. The proposal is to recover the letters of the promoters, or others on their behalf. The defender does not allege that the promoters wrote any letters. He says that letters were written, and that he has reason to believe that they emanated from the promoters. But he has not averred that in fact they did so. He is pleading his belief as a mitigation of his doing what is complained of. That is a very different thing from pleading and proving that the directors wrote these letters. Therefore I do not think it can be granted. This is altogether an attempt to abuse diligence, which the Court cannot sanction.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—I concur. This diligence as craved must be refused. With regard to the documents relating to the proceedings in 1846, I am prepared to refuse the diligence applicable to them, on the ground that it is too sweeping, and also, that at the discussion these documents it was said were to be used for the purpose of mitigating damages. They are not entitled so to use them, and the case of M'Neill is conclusive. But such being my opinion, I may add that there are some of these documents, which, if they have been properly described, I am not at this moment prepared to say may not be legitimately recovered by diligence. My reason is this: The pursuer, in his innuendo, accuses the defender of having charged him with certain things, one of which is that the pursuer, as one of the committee of management of the bank, had been guilty of such a juggle and malpractices, as those which some years before caused serious injury to the bank and the shareholders.

The pursuer here accuses the defender of having charged him with being guilty of certain things, and the defender is called upon to appear before a jury and meet that charge. Now what is the juggle, and what are the malpractices? The pursuer does not describe these directly in so many words in the innuendo. Now at the trial he will prove the nature of the juggle and malpractices. I assume he must do that, and how? I presume that he is entitled to produce such books and documents as will prove the nature of the juggle with which he has been charged. That being so, is the defender not entitled to prove, if he can, that he has not been guilty, and that he never accused the pursuer of a juggle of that kind? Are we now to determine that he is not to be in a position even to tender such evidence? If he had limited his demand, I am not prepared to say that we might not have granted it, but I reserve my opinion.

LORD DEAS.—I am glad that your Lordships are not disposed to grant this application, for it appears to me that, apart from other objections to it, the specification is in terms broad and sweeping to an unexampled degree, and that to grant diligence in such terms would be a mere abuse. I do not overlook the difference between the recovery of documents, to place them within the party's power, and the reception of them in evidence at the trial. But there must be a limit to such right of recovery. A litigant is not entitled to ransack the repositories of third parties, or to heap expense upon his opponent by extensive investigations throughout the country, and overloading the process with documents, the production of which at the trial will, it is plain, be either incompetent or useless. He must explain the object for which the writings are wanted, and shew, at least, a prima facie case in favour of their admissibility and utility. He must also so frame his specification that, both in respect of time and of the nature and number of the writings, it shall be reasonably definite. If he fails in any of these respects, his application falls to be refused, leaving him to lodge a different specification and to apply of new, which he may of course do as often as he pleases, if so advised. It is not for the Court to pick out a few words or a few lines here and there, and to frame a new specification for the party. If the defender thinks he can do that availably, let him do it for himself, and we will judge of the new specification when it comes. Meantime this specification seems to me objectionable, both on general and special grounds.

No. 219.

July 11, 1857.
Blaikie v.
Duncan.

The first seven articles admittedly apply to the transactions of 1846 referred to (although very loosely) in the issue, and in the first article¹ of the condescendence and answers. As to the nature of these transactions the parties seem to be agreed, for the admissions in the answer to article 1 of the condescendence are an echo of the statements in the article itself. I see no innuendo in the issue to entitle the pursuer to prove that these malpractices were of a different or worse description than the defender has admitted them to be. Nevertheless, as the defender might possibly have had a legitimate object to serve by the recovery of these writings, I asked his counsel what that object was?—whether he wished to make out that the transactions of 1846 were of a less or of a more culpable description than the pursuer represented them to have been? But to this question I received no answer. Now it is plain, that the worse these transactions were, the greater the libel. And if the defender had had in view to diminish damages by shewing that the conduct of those in the management in 1846, to which he likened the conduct of the pursuer and others, who were in the management in 1856 or 1857, was less culpable than it might otherwise be supposed to have been, would he not at once have said so, when the question was asked? He was bound to explain the object for which he wished to recover the writings, and his declining to do so would be, of itself, a sufficient reason for hoc statu refusing the diligence quoad the first seven articles of the specification, even if there were not other reasons.

But look at what is embraced by these articles. The writings are sought as having reference to what occurred in 1845, 1846, and 1847; but the writings, themselves, may be of any dates between the beginning of 1845 and the raising of the present action in the beginning of 1857—a period of twelve years. And articles 3d, 4th, and 7th, are not even limited to the date of raising the present action. Articles 1st and 2d embrace all entries in the bank books relative to the state of accounts between the bank and every person who had been a director of the bank in 1845 and 1846, as well as of Henry Paterson, the manager, and of every person who had been a joint obligant with Paterson or with any of these directors in the course of the above twelve years, and relative to all bills granted to the bank by all or any of these persons in the course of the same twelve years. Article 3d embraces all reports by the directors in and after 1847 with reference to the loss of capital, the discharge of Paterson, and the debts to the bank of all the parties just referred to. Articles 5, 6, and 7, relate to the shares, and to the transfer and forfeiture of the shares of all persons who have been directors of the Great North of Scotland Railway Company, from the beginning of 1845 to the raising of the present action, and the names of all shareholders who have attended meetings of the railway company during that period, and the names of all persons who had been directors of the company during that period.

Now, we need not consider whether circumstances might not be stated entitling the defender to an investigation even of this extensive kind, laying open the affairs of the bank, of Paterson who had been its manager, of every person who had been a director of it during these twelve years, and of every person who had been a joint obligant with Paterson or with any of these directors, during these years, and also laying open the affairs of the railway company, and of the directors and shareholders of that company for the same period—all without reference to any connection between these parties and the present action, over which they are not said to have any ¹ Art. 1 of the present action is in the same terms as art. 3 of that at the instance of the Bank, supra, p. 881.

No. 219.

July 11, 1857.
 Blaikie v.
 Duncan.

control. It is enough that no such circumstances are stated, or even attempted to be stated here. The defender asks this extraordinary diligence, and declines to specify any object whatever with a view to which he asks it. Then, as to article 4th of the specification, he is equally silent. But it is plain enough that that article relates to the pursuer's alleged share in the transactions of 1846, and that the object of it can be nothing else than to connect him with the malpractices of that period. We cannot allow a party charged with being a slanderer, under the guise of defending himself, to heap upon his opponent another and worse slander—to excuse his having likened the transaction of 1856–7 to the transactions of 1846, by shewing the atrocity of the transactions of 1846, and that the pursuer was a party to both sets of transactions, and this without either plea stated or issue taken in justification.

The remaining articles of the specification are directed to the recovery (and here again it is not limited even to the date of the present action) of all the books of the bank, and of the Denburn Railway Company, and of the Formartine and Denburn Railway Company, and all correspondence between the bank and these companies and the promoters of these companies, or between them, or any of them, and any other banks in Scotland, relative to advances made, or proposed to be made, to either of these two railway companies, with a view to make up their parliamentary deposits, and all correspondence between the promoters and others, on behalf of these railway companies, and the Bank of Scotland, the Union Bank, the Commercial Bank, and the National Bank, tending to prevent support from being given to another railway company, namely, the Aberdeen, Peterhead, and Fraserburgh Railway Company. To this is added a demand (in article 13) for all copies of certain newspapers transmitted by post from Aberdeen in January 1857 to any of the above banks or the office-bearers thereof, without reference to who may have been the senders of these newspapers, the nature or authorship of their contents, the object of sending them, or to the fact of the pursuer, or anybody for whom the pursuer could be held responsible, being in any way connected with them.

Now, this is a case in which, as I have already observed, no plea has been stated or issue taken in justification; and we must take care that under the mere pretence of mitigating damages, the defender shall not be allowed unduly to injure the pursuer and the companies or corporations with which he is connected, or to obtain a fishing diligence for purposes foreign to the legitimate objects of his defence against the present action. I do not question that a defender, for the bona fide purpose of mitigating his offence, is entitled to a certain latitude in proving the surrounding circumstances, a knowledge of which may have induced him to publish a particular libel, or to utter a particular slander; nor that even mere information conveyed to him, although erroneous, may not sometimes be allowed, under due precautions, to be proved for that purpose. But it does not follow that he can be allowed, by a general diligence of this kind before trial, to fish up facts and circumstances of which he does not pretend to have had any knowledge or credible information at the time, and which, for anything he pretends to know even now, may turn out either to have no existence or to justify the libel entirely by proving it to be true. If the defender knew or was credibly informed of the existence of any particular documents which mitigate without justifying the libel, let him say so and describe them specifically, so that we may know what we are about in granting or refusing his demand; or let him cite the proper custodiers of these documents (which it is quite competent for him to do) to bring them with them as witnesses and havers at the trial, where they may be used to refresh their memories with a view to questions in themselves held competent, and with means of determining whether their general import ought to be inquired into, which we cannot have now. For your Lordships are aware that general results, like the general import of reports and rumours, may often be inquired into, in mitigation of damages for slander, when the particulars, which might go too far, can neither fairly nor competently be obtained. I see nothing to prevent the defender from obtaining, in this way, from his witnesses, all the general explanations to which he is fairly entitled, of the circumstances which induced him to write the libel, including even the general impression created by the newspaper press. Be this as it may, however, this second branch of the specification appears to me to be objectionable, as well as the first. Nor does the defender ask the second branch if he does not get the first. His object, whatever it may be, is avowedly a combined use of the two.

He stands, indeed, upon his whole specification, and I think we have no course but to refuse his demand. No. 219.

I am the more disposed to be cautious in this matter, because the course the de- July 11, 1857.
fender has followed is unusual. The Lord Ordinary pronounced a judgment Curren v.
Dickson
(whether after much resistance or not I do not know) repelling the defender's plea against the relevancy of the action. The defender reclaimed, but at once consented to the refusal of his reclaiming note. I stated at the time, that, apart from such consent, I was not prepared hoc statu to have affirmed that interlocutor. Then came the issue proposed by the pursuer, to which the defender at once stated that he had no objections. I explained upon that occasion, and I repeat now, that if the defender had not agreed to the issue, I could not have sanctioned it, in its present form, nor do I suppose your Lordships would have done so. It is loose in the extreme, and contains neither innuendo nor explanation to make the allusion to the transactions of 1846 intelligible. Then the word "fraudulent," used in article 5 of the condescendence, is dropped out in the issue, and the only question put is, whether the libel falsely and calumniously asserts that, "through the reckless and improper connivance of the pursuer," and of the other directors of the bank, certain things were done. Now the defender himself says, in article 5 of his statements, that he did not mean to impute dishonesty to the pursuer and the other directors in doing these things, but merely to represent their conduct "as reckless and improper," and likely to reproduce the misfortunes of 1846. If the defender thus admits the construction put by the issue upon the libel to be a sound construction, what is the use of a trial? Is it the mere assessment of damages? All this concession, followed by a demand for a diligence of this unusual character, looks very much as if the defender's object was something else than the legitimate object of defence against this action; and this affords an additional reason for pausing before we grant the unusual demand now made.

LORD IVORY absent.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lords, having heard the counsel for the parties yesterday and to-day . . . Refuse the motion set forth in the notice of motion for diligence at the instance of the defender, No. 15 of process.

MURRAY & BEITH, W.S.—RANKEN, WALKER, & JOHNSTON, W.S.—Agents.

MRS ANN HISLOP OR CURRER, AND OTHERS, PURSUERS.—Penney—Black. No. 220.
WILLIAM DICKSON, Defender.—Pattison—Young.

Process—Diligence—Open Record.—An action of count and reckoning was brought on the allegation that the defender had been conducting a business for behoof of the pursuer for a number of years. The defender stated that after some years he had purchased the business, and had since carried it on for himself; but he produced no agreement. Before the record was closed the Lord Ordinary granted diligence to recover the whole business books, both before and after the alleged sale. In the Inner House the defender undertook to produce the agreement relating to the sale, and of consent the diligence was refused, so far as it embraced business books subsequent to the alleged sale.

MRS CURRER, for herself, and as executrix of her deceased husband, July 11, 1857.
Thomas Currer (who died in 1830), and her children, brought this action of 1st Division.
Ld. Ardmillan.
C.
count and reckoning against the defender, on the allegation that on her husband's death he had intromitted with his effects, and had carried on the business of a wine and spirit merchant for twenty-seven years for her behoof, and had never rendered any accounts. At the time of Thomas Currer's death the defender was a shopman in his employment, at No. 7 Antigua Street. He averred that for two years after her husband's death he carried on the business for Mrs Currer, and that in 1832 he was induced by her to purchase it, together with the stock in trade; that thereafter Currer and Company occupied that and the neighbouring shop, and carried on a similar business, and thereafter Currer and Dickson, but that in these

No. 220. businesses the pursuer had no concern. Before the record was closed the pursuer moved for a diligence to recover a number of inventories, pass-books, and other business books, of Thomas Currer, tending to shew the state of the business or stock at the date of Currer's death, and also of Mrs Currer, of Ann Currer, of Currer and Company, and of Currer and Dickson, or any of them. Also,

July 11, 1857.
Murray v.
Gentle.

"The books of the business conducted by the defender in No. 6 Antigua Street, in name of the said firms, or any of them, including the pass-book, or other book kept, in which the drawings of that business, and payments thereof, were entered."

The Lord Ordinary granted the diligence.

The defender reclaimed, and pleaded;—The diligence was too wide. The case was as yet only at that stage in which the parties were making their averments, not proving them. This might be a proper diligence when they came to proof; but the defender's averment, that he did not carry on the business for behoof of the pursuer, must in the meantime be assumed to be true.

LORD DEAS.—The defender has not produced any written agreement in support of his averments. If he had done so, that would have given him a prima facie case to stand upon as having carried on the business for himself.

Pattison, for the defender, thereupon undertook to produce such an agreement, and "of consent"

THE COURT "Refused the desire of the reclaiming note, in 'so far as' the specification related to the books and documents of the late Thomas Currer, and 'to the books of the business carried on by the defender in name of Mrs Currer, or of Ann Currer;' . . . and Quoad ultra 'Refused the motion for diligence.'"

DAVID CURRER, S.S.C.—JOHN ROBERTSON, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 221.

JAMES MURRAY GRANT, Pursuer.—Penney—Millar.
ROBERT GENTLE, Defender.—A. R. Clark.

Process—Issues.—In an action of damages by a landlord against his tenant for violation of the lease in burning heather, the defence was, that if the defender's servants had set fire to the heather, it was upon the employment of the shooting tenant or the pursuer;—Form of issues to try the question.

July 11, 1857.
1st Division.
Ld. Benholme.
C.

THE pursuer Grant brought this action against Gentle, who was tenant of two of the pursuer's farms, concluding for payment of L.500, as the amount of the damage which the pursuer had sustained in consequence of muir-burnings on the farms in December 1855, "and for which, as well as for all consequences resulting therefrom, the defender is responsible." The pursuer founded on the lease, by which the defender bound himself to observe the rules and regulations thereto subjoined—one of which was, that no tenant should be at liberty to burn muir without authority. "Each tenant will be answerable for any wood or muir burning on any part of his farm." He stated that certain differences between him and the defender had been referred to arbitration, which resulted in the defender being allowed an annual abatement from his rent—he renouncing all right to burn muir, &c. and undertaking not only not to burn the muir, but to preserve it. Notwithstanding this, on the occasion in question, a portion of a muir was set on fire, and in great part consumed; and it was alleged that "this was done by the defender, or by a person or persons in his employment, or upon his farms, acting upon his orders, express or implied, or at least with his privity, and for his benefit, and for whom he is responsible." The damage was laid at L.500.

He proposed the following issues:—

No. 221.

“It being admitted that the pursuer is the proprietor of the farms of Knockie and Foyerbeg, and that the defender is the tenant of these farms, under the lease granted by the pursuer, of which No. 10 of process is an extract,—

July 11, 1857.
Cunninghame.

“Whether, on or about the 21st day of December 1855, in violation of the provisions of his lease, a portion of the muir on the defender’s said farms, known by the name of ‘Fichel,’ was set on fire by the defender, or by others for whom he is responsible, and was in great part consumed, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer?”

The defender denied that the muir had been burned by his orders, or by any one for whom he was responsible; and alleged, that if his, the defender’s servants at any time set fire to heather, they were acting upon the employment or the authority of the shooting tenant, or of some other persons acting on behalf of the shooting tenant or the pursuer. He pleaded, that the pursuer was bound to specify the parties by whom he alleged the fires had been raised. The issue proposed by the pursuer was objectionable, in respect it did not shew what kind of responsibility attached to the defender for the act of the persons complained of. It did not follow, that because the defender’s servant might have done this act, the defender was liable. He proposed that the issue should be, whether “the defender by himself, or by others in his employment or on his farms, acting upon his orders, or with his privity, wrongfully set fire,” &c.

The following issues were adjusted:—

“It being admitted,” &c., as above,—

“Whether, on or about the 21st day of December 1855, in violation of the provisions of his lease, the defender did, by himself, or by another or others, set on fire a portion of the muir on the defender’s said farm, known by the name of ‘Fichel,’ to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer?”

SANG & ADAM, S.S.C.—GIBSON CRAIGS, DALZIEL, & BRODIE, W.S.—Agents.

JOHN CUNNINGHAME of Balgonie, Petitioner.—Bruce.

No. 222.

Entail—Amendment of petition—16 and 17 Vict., c. 94, sect. 3.

THE petition was presented, under the 16th and 18th sections of the July 14, 1857.
Entail Amendment Act, for authority to charge the entailed estate with outlay on improvements made subsequent to the passing of the Act.

1ST DIVISION.
L.

Instead, however, of praying for authority to grant bonds upon the whole expenditure, the prayer of the petition was framed, as in the case of improvements made previous to the passing of the Act, for authority to grant bond of annualrent on three-fourths, or bond and disposition in security for two-thirds of three-fourths of the expenditure.

In the body of the petition, the 13th section was erroneously quoted (instead of the 14th) as being applicable, in combination with the 16th section, to the case of such improvements executed subsequent to the passing of the Act.

After the petition had been served and intimated and advertised, but before any remit to the Lord Ordinary, the error was discovered, and a minute was given in by the petitioner, founding upon the 16th and 17th Vict., c. 94, sect. 3, and craving leave to amend the petition without farther service, intimation, or advertisement.

AMENDMENT refused, and petition withdrawn.

GIBSON & HECTOR, W.S.—Agents.

No. 223.

DAVID ROLLO, Pursuer and Respondent.—Fraser.

July 14, 1857.
 Rollo v.
 Thomson.

JAMES AND GEORGE THOMSON, Defenders and Advocators.—Penney—Gordon.

Property—Master and servant.—Held, that books in which the draughtsman of an engineering firm made sketches, from which finished drawings were afterwards made, of all the machinery made by his employers, but which contained no original designs by himself, belonged not to the draughtsman but to his employers; and that as he had authority to purchase the books at his employers' expense, it made no difference that he had in point of fact purchased them at his own.

1st Division.
 L.
 Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

ROLLO was employed by James and George Thomson, engineers, Glasgow, as draughtsman within their works, the Clyde Bank Foundry. He had sketch-books for that purpose. He left the Thomsons' employment in April 1854, taking eight of these sketch-books along with him. His employers claimed the books as their property, and having caused Rollo to be apprehended, the books were taken possession of by the police. Rollo then presented a petition to the Sheriff to have them restored. A record was made up, and proof led.

Among other witnesses Rollo was examined. He deponed,—“ I was engaged by the defenders at first as their draughtsman. My instructions from the defenders were, to prepare a combined view, finished drawings and details of all the machinery made by them.” . . . “ None of these sketch-books contained the finished drawings which were to be handed to the defenders. They contained merely the sketches from which such finished drawings were to be made.” . . . “ None of these books, to my knowledge, contain any original design, nor any sketch of any peculiarity of construction practised in the defenders' works, and no where else.” . . . “ The sketches in these books are partly from finished machinery, and partly from rough castings, to enable drawings to be made on a scale. I made the drawings for the castings from the instructions of Mr Thomson, and from sketch-books which he handed me. The finished drawings of all the machinery were to be kept by the defenders. A great many of the sketches in these books were done in the works during working hours; others were done at home. Occasionally, journeymen drew in these books under my directions, and what they did was done in the shop.” . . . “ I am not aware that the books contain sketches of any of the defenders' machinery, of which a finished drawing was not made, but such a thing might accidentally occur. All the sketches I got from Mr Thomson I left carefully rolled up in his drawing room. At first the working drawings of machines were made from such sketches. Laterly I designed them myself, and he revised them.”

The Sheriff-substitute (Smith) found the books to be the property of J. and G. Thomson, and refused the petition, with expenses. The Sheriff-depute (Alison) altered that interlocutor, and decerned for the petitioner—Finding that the books “ are mere sketch-books,” “ that finished drawings were made from these general sketches,” and, “ in point of law, that these finished drawings belonged to the defenders,” “ on general principles that such sketch-books belong to the artist, and the finished drawings to the employer;” “ that the evidence instructs that, generally speaking, sketch-books of a like description with the present belong to the draughtsmen, and are carried away by them.”

J. and G. Thomson advocated, and the case came before the First Division. The interlocutor pronounced by this Court thus states the facts established by the proof:—“ Find, in point of fact, 1st, That for some years prior to 7th April 1854, the respondent was in the employment of the advocates as foreman of the draughtsmen in their work called Clyde Bank Foundry, in or near Glasgow; 2d, That in this capacity the respondent kept in the said work the eight books in question, the contents of which, with the exception of some memoranda or entries said to have been made therein by the respondent for his individual purposes, consist exclusively of sketches from machinery which had been previously made and furnished by the advocates, and of sketches from rough castings, the property of the advocates, from which sketches the working drawings were afterwards prepared for machines to be made at the advocates' said work : 3d, That said sketches were made partly by the respondent in his capacity foresaid, and partly by assistant draughtsmen and others in the advocates' employment, acting under his superintendence : 4th, That in so far as those sketches consisted of sketches of finished machinery, such machinery had either been designed by the advocates, or the design thereof had been prepared by the respondent, and revised by the advocates ; and in so far as said sketches consisted of sketches from rough castings, such sketches were made partly according to instructions given by the advocates, and partly from other sketch-books handed by them to the respondent : 5th, That the respondent, in his capacity foresaid, was authorised by the advocates, while in their employment, to order such articles of stationery at their expense as might be necessary for the purposes of their said work ; and the advocates all along offered, and still offer, to repay to the respondent whatever sums he may have disbursed in purchasing the books in which the said sketches were afterwards made as aforesaid : 6th, That no demand has ever been made by the respondent for delivery of any memoranda or entries in the said books, separate from his demand for delivery and possession of the books themselves ; and the advocates have judicially stated at the bar their willingness that any separate memoranda or entries made by the respondent, exclusively for his individual purposes unconnected with their business, should be taken out of said books and given up to him if demanded."

No. 223.

July 14, 1857.
Rollo v.
Thomson.

In support of the note of advocacy it was pleaded ;—That this was not the case of an artist putting his first thoughts on paper. Rollo was not an inventor in any sense ; and even if he were, having been brought into the advocates' premises for the purpose of inventing machinery for them, he would not be entitled to take his invention away with him. But he was nothing but a copying clerk, and if he bought the sketch-books himself he had no right to do so, for the advocates always paid for such stationery.

The respondent pleaded ;—That what his employer purchased was finished designs and not first jottings. There must be a clear bargain or custom of trade before an artist who, like the respondent, sold his intellectual labour, could be deprived of his private note-book.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The judgment of the Sheriff-depute cannot stand. There may be private memoranda in these books, but, looking to the character of the books, such private memoranda ought not to have been there. There does not seem to have been any good reason for the respondent purchasing the books at his own cost, for he had power when he required them, to order them at his employers' expense. Again, the books contain all the draughts of all the draughtsmen in the employment of the advocates. So that the respondent's position is this, that without his master's knowledge he buys these books with his own money, and having got all these draughts inserted into them he claims the whole as belonging to himself—not as belonging to the journeymen or draughtsmen. It further appears that these drawings were made in furtherance of the business of the advocates, and what is very important, these sketches are the combined work of the respondent and advocates, for he admits that when he designed anything the advocates revised it, and that none of the books contain any original design. Therefore, looking at all these things, the books appear to me to be the property of the advocates and not of the respondent.

LORDS IVORY and CURRIEHILL concurred.

LORD DEAS.—I give no opinion upon any question of general principle such as

No. 223. the Sheriff-depute goes upon in his interlocutor; nor upon cases of artists and authors, such as have been put from the bar. I am willing to take the case as we find it in the evidence of the respondent himself, who was foreman of the draughtsmen in the advocates' foundry where machinery is made. (His Lordship here quoted the evidence of Rollo as given above.) There is other evidence which I need not go into, the respondent's own account of the matter being, I think, sufficient to entitle us to hold that the books in question belong to the advocates. Their contents consist of sketches and working drawings. The sketches are all sketches of castings or portions of machinery in the advocates' works. The working drawings were all either prepared under the direction of the advocates or revised by them. The whole were produced by labour paid for by them, except in so far as the respondent may voluntarily have done something at home when he took away any of the books in his pocket, as he says he often did, although the proper place for keeping them was at the works. The whole were intended exclusively for the purposes of the advocates' works, and I do not doubt that they are their property. I am not moved by the fact that the respondent paid the stationer for the books. He need not have done so. He had authority to cause them to be charged to the advocates, and they offered to repay him the cost so soon as they knew he had disbursed it. If there be any memorandums of his own in the books, no objection is made to his taking them out.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor: (after the findings in fact above quoted)—“In these circumstances, find in point of law that the said books belong to the advocates, and that the respondent is not entitled to delivery or possession thereof: Therefore, refuse his petition to the Sheriff, reserving his claim for any sums he can show to have been disbursed by him in purchasing said books, and to be still due to him, and his claim, if he shall assert the same debito tempore, for delivery of any separable memoranda or entries which may have been made by him in the said books exclusively for his individual purposes and unconnected with the advocates' business: Grant warrant to and ordain the Sheriff-clerk to deliver up the said books to the advocates, and decern: Find the advocates entitled to expenses both in this Court and the inferior Court: and remit,” &c.

PATRICK PAUL, W.S.—WEBSTER & RENNIE, W.S.—Agents.

No. 224.

ROBERT HENDERSON ROBERTSON, Petitioner.—Fraser.

ANTONIO DE SALVI AND OTHERS, Respondents.—D. Mackenzie—Scott.

Bankruptcy—19 and 20 Vict., c. 79, sects. 45, 47—Foreign—Mandatory—Liberation.—A Scotchman carrying on business in London was imprisoned in the Queen's Bench Prison at the instance of an English creditor. He took out sequestration in Scotland as a partner of a Company, carrying on business in Scotland and in London, and as an individual. A petition for liberation was opposed by the incarcerating creditors;—Held (1) that he was not bound to sist a mandatory, he being detained furth of Scotland at the instance of the opposing creditor; but (2), (cf. judgment of Lord Mackenzie), apart from the question of competency, that the whole proceedings required explanation, and no sufficient case for liberation had been made out.

Question, Whether the Court of Session has power under the bankruptcy Act to grant liberation from an English Prison?

July 14, 1857.

1st Division.
Ld Mackenzie
C.

THE petitioner, Robertson, obtained sequestration under the Scotch Bankruptcy Act in March 1857. He now applied for liberation from the Queen's Bench Prison, where he was detained at the instance of the respondent de Salvi, who, as well as another English creditor of the name of Gower, opposed this application. The facts of the case were thus stated by the Lord Ordinary in a note:—

“The Lord Ordinary has no hesitation in refusing the prayer of this petition.

“The petitioner, Robert Henderson Robertson, states that he carried on business as a bill-broker in London; that he resided in Berkeley Square; and that he was tenant of a house and grounds at Sunning Hill, in the neighbourhood of Windsor. According to his own account, all his creditors reside in England, and he does not pretend that he has any property or funds of any kind in Scotland.

No. 224.
—
July 14, 1857.
Robertson v.
De Salvi.

“In September 1856, the petitioner was imprisoned in the Queen’s Bench Gaol, Southwark, London, under diligence at the instance of the respondent, Antonio de Salvi, for a debt of L.208, 18s.; and detainers have been lodged with the keeper of the prison against the petitioner by Mr Gower and several other creditors, all of them residing in England. The object of this petition is to obtain liberation from this imprisonment, under the 45th and 47th sections of the Bankruptcy Scotland Act, 1856. Apart from any question of competency which has been reserved, the Lord Ordinary is satisfied, from an examination of the proceedings in the sequestration as engrossed in the Sederunt-book, that a warrant of liberation should not be granted in favour of the petitioner.

“In March 1857, the petitioner, with concurrence of a friendly English creditor, Thomas Broster, applied for, and obtained, sequestration in Scotland. The sequestration was taken out against a firm of Broadbent and Co., described as woollen-merchants in Glasgow, Wigton, and London, ‘and Robert Henderson Robertson, as a partner of said company, and as an individual.’ No description is given of the petitioner by his occupation or address, so as to enable his English creditors, from the notice in the Gazette, to discover that he was the party to whom the sequestration applied. At the meeting held for the election of trustee, nobody appeared in the character of a creditor except the mandatory of Mr Broster, the creditor who concurred in the petition, and this mandatory voted for the election of a trustee, and fixed the caution at L.10.

“In the Sederunt-book, there is a list of the creditors of Broadbent and Co., and the individual partners, from which it appears that all their creditors reside in England. It does not appear that the company ever had any funds or property in Scotland which could be carried by the sequestration. The pretended state of assets of Broadbent and Company is a complete caricature. It embraces a land-grant of 1500 acres in Poyais, upon which the trustee, in his report, places no value; and, so far as appears, this company, which pretends to have carried on business in Glasgow, Wigton, and London, had no other funds or property of any kind. The trustee’s report of 21st April 1857, bears: ‘I have got no books nor any other documents;’ and he adds, that there is no stock in trade, no book debts, and no other assets.

“There is a list of the petitioner’s English creditors in the sederunt-book. But, while he professes to have carried on business in London as a bill-broker, and was sequestrated as an individual, he has given up no state of his affairs, and no account of any assets or property belonging to him. By the 80th section of the Bankruptcy Act it is enacted, “That the trustee shall, as soon as may be after his appointment, take possession of the bankrupt’s estate and effects, and of his title-deeds, books, bills, vouchers, and other papers and documents.’ And by the 81st section of the same Act it is declared: ‘The bankrupt shall make up, and at the meeting appointed for the election of a trustee, deliver to the clerk of such meeting a state of his affairs, specifying his whole property wherever situated, the property in expectancy into which he may have an eventual right, the names and designations of his creditors and debtors, and the debts due by and to him,’ &c. Except in giving a list of his English creditors, the petitioner has entirely failed to comply with this important provision of the Bankrupt Act.

“The practical result is sufficiently startling. The trustee reports, 1st,

No. 224. That there are no books or documents; and 2d, That there are no available assets of any kind belonging to the pretended company, or to the individual partners, so far as disclosed to him.

July 14, 1857.
Robertson v.
De Salvi.

“The condescendence for the petitioner does not profess to explain these gross irregularities. The petitioner does not give any account of his connection with Broadbent and Company. As to his private affairs, he merely says, that the whole of his furniture has been made over to his wife and children, so as to be beyond the reach of his creditors. But the decisive points against him are,—1st, That he has delivered up no business-books; and 2d. That he has given up no assets, and no state of affairs, as required by the 81st section of the statute.

“In these circumstances, the Lord Ordinary must be permitted to express his surprise, that the trustee should have granted a certificate of the bankrupt having made a fair disclosure of the position of the estate—a statement which it is impossible to reconcile with the official report of the trustee in the sederunt-book, and the whole proceedings in the sequestration, which are of a most discreditable character.”

The minutes of a meeting held 30th April 1857, of the creditors of Broadbent and Company, bore that the trustee stated “that the examination of the bankrupts had not taken place in consequence of the inability to attend by J. Broadbent from indisposition, and R. H. Robertson from his being confined in Queen’s Bench Prison, London. The meeting instructed the trustee to concur in a petition to the Lord Ordinary to have R. H. Robertson liberated, that he might come here to be examined.” The certificate of the trustee was dated 29th May 1857, and bore that Robertson had made a fair disclosure of his affairs, and “that the interests of the estate had suffered through his incarceration.”

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor on 11th June 1857:—“Refuses the petition, and decerns; finds the petitioner liable in expenses: Allows an account thereof to be given in,” &c.

The petitioner reclaimed, praying the Court to grant warrant for his immediate liberation, or, “at all events, for his liberation from prison that he may appear in Scotland and undergo the statutory examination, he giving reasonable caution to return to prison to abide the judgment of the Court on this petition after the said examination shall be taken; to find the petitioner entitled to expenses,” &c.

When the case was called, the opposing creditors moved that the petitioner should sist a mandatory.

Fraser, for the petitioner, stated that a few days ago the respondent, De Salvi, had assaulted the petitioner in the Queen’s Bench Prison to the danger of his life,—the respondent Gower being present; and he now produced medical certificates to the effect that the petitioner could no longer be kept in prison without danger to his life.¹ He therefore pleaded — That this was not a case for a mandatory.² The petitioner’s absence was involuntary. He was desirous to come to this country to go through his examination, but he was detained in England by the respondents. Farther. England was not a foreign country quoad hoc; and, under the statute, the jurisdiction of the Court extended to the whole country. To insist on a mandatory would be virtually to prevent this person being heard, for who would be cautioner or mandatory for a bankrupt?

Scott, for De Salvi, maintained;—That, under this petition, the bankrupt was bound to sist a mandatory.

¹ See the “Times” newspaper of 8th and 9th July.

² Hossack v. Laidlaw, 16th December 1841, ante, vol. iv. p. 268.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This application for liberation is presented by a party No. 224. detained in prison by its opponents. He is desirous of coming down here to be examined, but his opposing creditors will not allow him. They cannot, in these July 14, 1857. circumstances, insist on a mandatory. Robertson v. De Salvi.

LORDS IVORY and CURRIEHILL concurred.

LORD DEAS.—I do not think it necessary to go beyond the cause of absence; because I consider this sufficient to entitle us to refuse the demand for a mandatory. Whenever such a demand is made the party is entitled to elide it by appearing at the bar so often as his presence is required. The order to sist a mandatory is consequent only on failure so to appear. But if his opponent thrusts him, on the one hand, into a foreign jail and keeps him there, and, on the other hand, insists on his appearing at this bar, how can the man comply? More especially in the present case, where the whole question to be tried is the question of liberation, how can the respondents insist that the petitioner shall appear at this bar before he can be allowed to try the question whether he is to be liberated or not? The proposition that a party so situated must sist a mandatory before he can be heard is extravagant. There may be other grounds for refusing this demand, but I think the one is sufficient.

On the merits,—

Fraser, for the petitioner, put the petition on two grounds—first, on the ground stated in the medical certificates; and, second, upon the condescendence. He pleaded;—That the Lord Ordinary had decided the case on a point and not pleaded either in the answers or at the bar. There was no room for blaming the petitioner for extravagant living nor fraudulent conduct. He had been imprisoned for nine months, with only two opposing creditors. There was no ground for refusing this application except neglect of statutory duty, and the petitioner was willing, so far as able, to perform it. The respondents were not called on.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Court do not wish to hear more. A great deal must be cleared up here before we can grant this liberation. There is a great want of information both as to the cause of the petitioner's bankruptcy and as to the course of sequestration, and as to why it is that, when his business and creditors are in England, sequestration is attempted to be carried out in Scotland. That is in itself a matter which shews that the party's conduct requires explanation. As to the statements regarding his health, that is something altogether extrinsic to the bankruptcy, I am not prepared to assume that, if they be accurate, there are no means in Scotland to interpose and save a prisoner's life. However, apart from this matter, it is quite clear for not granting this liberation.

LORD IVORY.—I am of the same opinion. I have great doubts as to the power of this Court to grant liberation from prison in England, or of one Sheriff to grant a warrant of liberation from the prison of another county. These are grave questions, which it is not necessary now to enter into, for your Lordship has put the matter on the proper ground.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—I have considerable doubts as to the question of competency. It is an abuse to which the process of sequestration is exposed, that parties avail themselves of it as an instrument for obtaining protection from personal diligence. This is not the proper object of sequestration; and, therefore, we should be very careful to prevent it. This looks like a case of that kind, and I am for refusing the application.

LORD DEAS.—Even assuming that there is here a good sequestration, and admitting also the competency of granting the warrant craved, it is discretionary, under section 45 of the statute, to grant the warrant or not. Now, on the grounds assigned by your Lordship and those assigned by the Lord Ordinary, I am of opinion that this petition has been rightly refused. In this point of view, it is unnecessary to consider the larger questions alluded to by your Lordships. It is only by going back to the statements in the petition and condescendence, and taking into view the danger to life, now for the first time alleged at the bar, that it becomes at all necessary to consider whether this is a good and effectual sequestration, and, if so, whether, if it be so, we can competently grant the warrant craved. Now I am

No. 224. not at present prepared to hold that this is a good and effectual sequestration. I think there is much to be enquired into and ascertained before we can be satisfied that it is anything else than an abuse of the form of sequestration without the substance. Prima facie there are many objections to it, and, till these are cleared up and removed, I am not disposed to consider whether danger to life be a good ground for liberation from an English prison, nor whether it be competent for us to liberate from such prison at all.

July 14, 1857.
Farrell v.
Arnott.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor :—" Refuse the desire of the said reclaiming note : Adhere to the interlocutor reclaimed against : Find the reclaimer liable to the respondent in additional expenses of process : Allow an account to be given in, and remit," &c.

JOHN WALLS, S.S.C.—WOTHERSPOON & MACK, S.S.C.—HUGHES & MYLNE, W.S.—Agents.

No. 225. MRS BELL OR ISABELLA YOUNG OR FARRELL, Suspender.—D. F. Inglis—A. B. Shand.

JAMES ARNOTT AND OTHERS, Respondents.—Moir—Horn—A. R. Clark.

Arbitration—Interdict—Pactum illicitum.—Held, that it was not a good ground for interdicting an arbiter from proceeding with a submission that he was about to consider and dispose of a claim alleged to be illegal, as founded on a pactum de quota litis. Observed, that it was not to be assumed that the arbiter would not rightly dispose of such a claim.

July 14, 1857.

2D DIVISION.
Ld. Mackenzie
Bill-Chamber.
R.

THE late Alexander Wood of Woodburnden, in Kincardineshire, died intestate about the year 1844, leaving a large succession, both heritable and moveable. Two country writers agreed to set on foot an investigation to discover Mr Wood's heir, and to assist him in obtaining possession of his property. After inquiry they came to be of opinion that Mrs Bell Young or Farrell was the party best entitled to the succession. As neither she nor her husband had any means for carrying on a protracted litigation, which it was seen was likely to ensue, the writers in the country, along with agents in Edinburgh and in Aberdeen, agreed to carry on the legal proceedings necessary to enforce Mrs Farrell's rights, who, after the litigation had begun, undertook, by a letter dated 23d November 1846, that in the event of success, " payment for professional trouble and charges also should be liberal with a reasonable commission and allowance on the value of the property obtained, and the extent of your own risk, trouble, and outlays, and for advances to us and for our support."

After much litigation Mrs Farrell's right to the succession was established. Subsequently a submission was entered into between Mrs Farrell, on the one part, and Mr James Arnott, W.S., who had acted as her agent in Edinburgh, and the other gentlemen who had acted as agents during the course of the litigation, on the other part, whereby they agreed to refer to Mr James Burness, S.S.C., as sole arbiter, all accounts or claims due, charges for risk, commission, and others. After the arbiter had taxed all the ordinary professional charges, the agents, over and above these sums, claimed commission on the amount recovered by Mrs Farrell. She then raised a reduction of the letter of 23d November 1846, above noticed, so far as it referred to commission, and of the submission, so far as it embraced any such claim. She also presented this note of suspension and interdict, praying to have the arbiter interdicted from proceeding in the submission.

It was alleged that he had issued a note, stating his intention to proceed with the submission, notwithstanding the dependence of the action of reduction.

The Lord Ordinary on the Bills pronounced this interlocutor :—" Refuses the note, but reserves to the complainer all pleas competent to her in the action already raised, or in any reduction or other process, in the event of a decree-arbitral being pronounced; and to all the other parties their answers to any such pleas, as accords: Finds the complainer liable in expenses," &c.*

No. 225.

July 14, 1857.
Farrell v.
Arnott.

* "NOTE.—The Lord Ordinary is not aware of any case where the Court has interfered, by interdict, to stop an arbiter from proceeding with a submission in circumstances similar to the present; and he thinks it would be attended with the most dangerous consequences were any countenance given to such an application.

"By formal deeds of submission entered into between the parties, they submitted all accounts of law business incurred by the complainer Mrs Farrell to her law-agents, and all accounts for cash advances and commission, and all questions and differences connected therewith, to Mr James Burness, S.S.C., Edinburgh, as sole arbiter. Mr Burness accepted of this submission, and a great variety of proceedings have taken place under it. He has taxed the business accounts claimed by the respondents, but he has given no decision on these claims for commission; and the object of the present application is to have him interdicted from proceeding, as arbiter under the submission, to consider or adjudicate upon any such claims.

"It is not pretended that there is anything in the form of the deed of submission to render it pactum illicitum, and it does not ex facie labour under any intrinsic nullity. Neither is it alleged that the arbiter has become disqualified by interest in the issue, corrupt conduct, or any other cause, from discharging his duty. The sole grounds upon which interdict has been sought are, that the respondents' claim for commission is illegal, and that the complainer has brought a reduction of the submission and other documents, so far as they relate to that claim. But it does not appear to the Lord Ordinary that any relevant grounds have been stated to warrant the interference of the Court by interdict, to stop the proceedings of the arbiter under the submission.

"The main point urged by the complainer is, that the letter by her and her late husband to Mr Alexander Smart, dated 23d November 1846, is pactum de quota litis, and as such null and reducible. All such pactions are strongly reprobated by our law, and no reduction is necessary to establish their nullity—Mackenzie v. Forbes, 23d July 1774, 5 Brown's Sup. 528; Johnstone, 1st February 1831, 9 Sh. 364. If the respondents' claims for commission in the submission were founded entirely on that letter, the objection of the complainer may be insuperable, and the arbiter may think himself bound to give effect to it. But Mr Arnott, the Edinburgh agent, so far back as 6th March 1857, intimated to the complainer that he had no interest to defend the reduction of the letter of 23d November 1846, to which he was no party, and on the special terms of which he stated he founded no claims whatever. All the respondents state that they had occasion to manage a variety of cash transactions on behalf of the complainer, on which, apart from special agreement, a commission is payable, according to ordinary usage, and for the trouble and risk connected with these transactions it is said no charges were made in the business accounts.

"Assuming, however, for the sake of argument, that all the claims of the respondents for commission are illegal, that surely would be no ground for stopping the arbiter from adjudicating upon them under the submission. Neither is it of any consequence to allege, that the respondents are founding in the submission on the letter of 23d November 1846, which the complainer maintains to be void and null as a pactum de quota litis, any more than it would be a sufficient ground for staying an arbiter's proceedings, to allege that one of the parties was founding upon a forged bill, or any other document liable to an objection in point of law. It is the province of the arbiter to consider and dispose of all such objections, and it must be presumed that he will do his duty by giving effect to them where they are well founded.

"It is equally clear, that the mere circumstance that one of the parties has thought fit to raise a reduction or declarator for the purpose of setting aside the submission, in whole or in part, is no ground for interdicting the arbiter from adjudication upon the claims submitted to him. Great and irremediable mischief might arise from such interruptions; whereas, on the other hand, if the proceedings of

No. 225. The suspender reclaimed, and pleaded;—It was during the dependence of the litigation as to the Woodburnden succession that Mrs Farrell had signed the letter on which the claim for commission was founded. What was sought to be done in this case was to enforce a pactum de quota litis. This was a claim which plainly could not be enforced, being contra bonos mores; the Court should therefore interdict the arbiter from going on to consider it. That it was sought to be enforced in the course of a submission did not entitle such a claim to more favour than in the ordinary case. The respondents' counsel were not called on.

THE COURT adhered.

CHEYNE & STUART, W.S.—JAMES ARNOTT, W.S.—WEBSTER & RENNY, W.S.—Agents.

No. 226. C. M. BARSTOW, Appellant.—D. F. Inglis—Mackenzie.
DONALD LINDSAY (Cameron and Company's Trustee). Respondent.—Penney—Gordon.

Bankruptcy.—In the course of two litigations between the individual partners of a mercantile firm, in neither of which the company appeared, although called as defenders in one of them, various remits were made to an Accountant, and large accounts incurred to him. The firm having been sequestrated,—Held (aff. judgment of Lord Mackenzie), that the Accountant had no claim against the company estate, but only against the individual estates of the partners.

July 15, 1857. THE nature of the claim here made on the estates of a bankrupt company, and the whole circumstances, are set forth by the Lord Ordinary in a note appended to his interlocutor, which affirmed the deliverance of the trustee in the sequestration rejecting the claim:—

1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Mackenzie
L.

“The appellant, Mr Barstow, lodged a claim to be ranked preferably on the sequestrated estates of Cameron and Company, and of John Cameron and James M'Murray, the two partners of that company, as individuals, for the sum of L.1463, 17s. 10d., being the balance of certain accounts said to be due to him as an accountant, under remits in two actions which lately depended before the Court. Being of opinion that the litigation, out of which the claim has arisen, was a dispute between the two partners affecting their individual interests solely, and in no degree referring to any matter in which the interests of the company as such were involved, and that in any view Mr Barstow was not entitled to a preference over the other creditors, the trustee, by his deliverance, ‘rejects the claim of preference made by the claimant; and he rejects any claim by the claimant against the estate of the company.’ After carefully considering the proceedings in the two actions under which the remits were made, and the accounts in question were incurred, the Lord Ordinary sees no ground for disturbing the judgment of the trustee.

“It appears that four accounts are said to have been incurred to the appellant, amounting in the aggregate to L.1958, 9s. 2d., and, after deducting a payment of L.500 made to account, less expenses, the balance claimed is L.1463, 17s. 10d. Now it is important to observe, that the first three accounts in the abstract for L.591, 18s., L.26, 5s., and L.1279, 8s. 2d., all related to business done under two remits from the Court, on the 15th March and 30th May 1854, under the first action, which was brought at the the arbiter shall ultimately be found to be illegal or ineffectual, the party aggrieved will have his remedy in a reduction.

“These views are strongly confirmed by various decisions of the Court. See Fraser v. Gordon, 5th July 1834, 12 Shaw, 887. Drew v. Leburn, 8th June 1851, 12 D. 983, and 12th February 1852, 14 D. 559; affirmed in the House of Lords, 8th March 1855, 2 Macqueen, p. 1.”

instance of Cameron, one of the partners of the company, against M'Murray, who was the other partner.¹ The company are neither pursuers nor defenders of that action. True, it concludes for payment 'to the said firm of Cameron and Company, and to the pursuer and defender, as individual partners thereof;' but the action was evidently intended to be a count and reckoning between the two partners for their individual interests, and accordingly it called upon M'Murray, who had been in the active management of the concern, to account for his intromissions with the funds, both of the old and the new company, in order that the balance due by him might be ascertained. Under this action no decree could be obtained at the instance of the company, and, by a singular omission, no conclusion to make payment to the pursuer as an individual. It thus appears that the three first accounts, which embrace the great bulk of the expenses claimed, were all incurred under remits made in the first action, to which the company were no parties, either as pursuers or defenders.

No. 226.
 July 15, 1857.
 Barstow v.
 Lindsay.

"As to the last account claimed, which amounts only to L.60, 18s., it was incurred under a remit from the Court on the 20th November 1855, after the supplementary action had been raised and conjoined with the original action. That remit was made to obtain an interim report, so as to enable the Court to dispose of a motion by Cameron for an interim payment.

"The Court had decided on the 13th June 1855, in the original action at Cameron's instance against M'Murray, 'that under the conclusions of the present summons there are no termini habiles for pronouncing interim decree in favour of the pursuer individually.' To obviate this difficulty, and enable Cameron to obtain decree for such share of the profits as might be due to him, a supplementary action was raised at his instance on 26th June 1855, directed against Cameron and Company, and against M'Murray as managing partner, and as having intromitted with the funds of the company, and also as an individual.

"In this supplementary action, as in the original one, Cameron was the sole pursuer. The company were not pursuers; and though they were called as defenders, along with M'Murray, in order to give validity in point of form to any decree which might affect the company estate, no appearance was made for them. Defences were given in solely by M'Murray, and a record was made up between him and Cameron, to which the company were no parties. The supplementary action was conjoined with the original one on 13th November 1855, and, as already explained, the only remit made to Mr Barstow, after the supplementary summons was brought, related to the interim report, the expenses of which are stated at L.60, 18s.

"It was only as a step to make out a case against M'Murray, that Cameron and Company were called as nominal defenders in the second action. They never appeared as parties to the record, either as pursuers concurring in the conclusions, or as defenders resisting them. All the litigation from first to last was carried on between Cameron and M'Murray for their individual interests, and a single glance at the record will show that all Cameron's complaints were directed against M'Murray. The company were not the litigants in any sense, and they were not the parties who caused the remits under which the appellant's accounts were incurred. It cannot be said, therefore, that the accounts were incurred on the employment or responsibility of the company, whatever recourse the appellant may have against Cameron and M'Murray, or their estates, as individuals.

"At the debate Mr Barstow founded strongly on the circumstance, that in March 1856 he received payment of L.500 to account of his claim, by a draft on Cameron and Company. But this does not imply that the company considered themselves as the proper obligants in the debt. All the

¹ Ante, vol. xvii. pp. 870, 1142.

No. 226. funds belonging to Cameron and M'Murray were involved in the concern of Cameron and Company, and when the partners consented to the advance from the company funds, all questions of liability were reserved. It is stated that M'Murray placed the draft for L.500 in the books of the company to the debit of Cameron; and there is a letter produced from Cameron's agent, No. 11 of process, bearing that he only consented to the payment, 'reserving his claim against Mr James M'Murray personally for the whole sum in a question of expenses.'

July 15, 1857.
Sutherland v.
Monkland
Railways Co.

"It was likewise contended on the part of the trustee, that the creditors of the company had derived no real benefit from the remits under which the accounts were incurred, or the proceedings which had followed on these remits. A voluminous report had been prepared in reference to the affairs of the old company, which was dissolved in April 1850; but it was stated that no report had been lodged in reference to the affairs of the existing company, under the second remit made to Mr Barstow—the prosecution of the enquiry having been stopped, and rendered unnecessary by the sequestration on the 16th June 1856.

"On these grounds the Lord Ordinary concurs with the trustee in holding that the appellant is not entitled to be ranked as a creditor on these accounts upon the sequestrated estate of the Company. For any sum that may be justly due to him, the appellant seems entitled to be ranked as an ordinary creditor, on the individual estates of Cameron and M'Murray; but that is a question which is not raised by the present appeal.

"As to the claim made by the appellant to a preference over the other creditors, the Lord Ordinary is not aware of any ground on which it could be maintained; and though special attention was directed to it at the debate, the point was apparently considered so hopeless, that nothing was attempted to be said in support of it, except that the demand for a preference was not to be held as abandoned."

Barstow reclaimed, pleading—That the employment arose out of the contract of copartnership; and that, therefore, the Company were liable.

THE COURT adhered, with additional expenses.

J. & F. ANDERSON, W.S.—DUNDAS & WILSON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 227.

WILLIAM SUTHERLAND, Pursuer.—Clark.

THE MONKLAND RAILWAYS COMPANY, Defenders.—Mackenzie.

Master and servant—Responsibility for injury to workman.—A workman ordered by an overseer to do what is clearly beyond the limits of the work for which he is engaged, and thereby expose himself to danger, obeys at his own risk, and has no claim for damages against his master for injuries received in doing so.

July 15, 1857.

2d DIVISION.
Ld. Handyside
I.

THIS was an action concluding for damages in respect of an injury suffered by the pursuer while employed as a breaksman on the defenders' railway. The pursuer averred:—He was 23 years of age, and in receipt of wages amounting to 14s. per week, when he was engaged by Mr Gray, the locomotive inspector on the railway, to act as breaksman on goods trains on their railway, and particularly on the Bathgate Branch. Gray informed the pursuer when he was engaged, "that he was to act under the instructions of the engineman, and especially of George Simpson, to whose goods train the pursuer was attached." As breaksman the pursuer's duty was "to couple and uncouple waggons, and use the break when occasion required." His proper place on the train was on the hindmost waggon, for the purpose of using the break. The defenders had not stationed any pointsman at the Blackstone Junction, where the branch joined the main line; and to supply this deficiency, George Simpson, the engineman, "had, in order to save time and to prevent the necessity of stopping the train, been in the practice of ordering the pursuer, when nearing Blackstone Junction, and when the train was in motion, to jump forward along the train till he came to the points, that he might descend as the foremost part of the train reached them, in order to shift the switches, and then jump up on the train after the last part of the train had passed them." To do so formed no part of the pursuer's duty as breaksman, and it placed him in considerable danger. On the 7th January 1856, the pursuer was travelling on the Bathgate branch acting as breaksman of a train consisting of several waggons, some of which were in front of, and some behind the engine. In order to get the train on the main line, it was necessary to shift the points at the junction. The pursuer was then engaged in front of the engine throwing sand upon the rails to prevent the wheels from slipping. He was desired by the engineman to jump forward on the train and shift the points. In doing so his feet slipped and he fell. A waggon wheel passed over his arm, and so crushed it as to render amputation necessary. "It was the duty of the defenders to have a pointsman there, and through their failure to do so, the pursuer sustained the injury. Immediately after the accident the defenders appointed a pointsman at the junction."

No. 227.

July 15, 1857.
Sutherland v.
Monkland
Railways Co.

The Lord Ordinary appointed parties to lodge issues, and afterwards, in respect parties were not agreed, his Lordship reported the case.

After bearing parties, the Court made avizandum. At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am of a very strong opinion that there has been no relevant matter averred here inferring liability on the part of the Monkland Railway Company. The pursuer was employed as a breaksman, his duty in that capacity being to keep his place on the hindmost waggon, and be ready to do anything necessary in the way of stopping the speed of the train. Then he alleges that at this junction, where the accident happened, the defenders had not stationed a pointsman; and to make up for this deficiency in the necessary service of the railway, Simpson, the engine-driver, had been in the practice of telling the pursuer to perform this dangerous feat. He says expressly that it was not his duty to shift the points, but that it was the duty of the defenders to employ a pointsman at that place.

Now it appears to me to be a material fact in favour of the defenders that there was no pointsman at this place, as that shews most clearly that it was never contemplated that the train should run on past these points without stopping. That the breaksman should get off the train and open the points was most natural, because it was most convenient that he should do so. But when the engine-driver ordered the pursuer to do what resulted in so serious a risk, viz., to pass from waggon to waggon while the train was running on, so as to get down in time to open the points and then climb up again, he did a very rash thing, and in which, if his orders were obeyed by the breaksman, it was at the latter's own risk. I do not think there is any ground stated here on which we can find the pursuer is entitled to an issue.

LORD MURRAY.—I am of the same opinion. I do not see how or on what principle of law the defenders can be made liable for this accident.

LORD WOOD.—I concur. If I could have read the pursuer's condescendence as an averment that the pursuer was told by Gray to obey Simpson in any other respect than with reference to his duty as breaksman, I would have had less difficulty. If he obeys the engineman in any other matters he does so in what is out of his proper duty, and at his own risk. I do not think the pursuer has averred any case sufficient to constitute liability against the defenders.

LORD COWAN.—I am of the same opinion.

To give relevancy to the pursuer's case, there must be in the record averments tracing the injury for which damages are claimed to some cause, with which the defenders can be connected, and for which they are alleged to be responsible, through fault or negligence on the part of themselves, or others acting for them, or under their orders. This record contains no such averments. The pursuer alleges that, although his proper place as breaksman was on the hindmost waggon of the train, the engine-driver had been in the practice of directing him to go to the foremost

No. 227. waggon along the tops of all the intermediate waggons and to shift the points, so as to prevent the necessity of stopping the train at the junction of the branch line. He also avers, that doing this was no part of his duty as breaksman, and that it put him in considerable danger ; and to this it is that he ascribes the accident. But the defenders are not connected directly or indirectly with this by any averments in the record. The pursuer indeed says, that when engaged as breaksman he was told by the manager to obey the engine-driver ; but this could apply only to orders relating to such matters as were within his proper duty as breaksman. The pursuer, from anything that is stated, was not placed in any position as the servant of the defenders which bound him to obey the engine-driver's orders in matters beyond the proper duty of his own department on the train. And yet to his acting under such orders, his claim for damages is exclusively traced in the record.

I think, therefore, that this action ought to be dismissed.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor :—" Find that the statements of the pursuer on this record do not entitle him to insist in his claim for damages against the defenders : Dismiss the action, and decern : Find the defender entitled to expenses," &c.

ADAMSON & GULLAND, W.S.—WOTHERSPOON & MACK, W.S.—Agents.

No. 228. WILLIAM M'LEAN, Petitioner.—D. F. Inglis—A. R. Clark.
WILLIAM HAMILTON, Respondent.—Sol.-Gen. Maitland—Young.

Property—Water.—A superior heritor is not entitled during flood-time to divert from the natural channel of a stream the excess of water over the ordinary flow, without returning it before the stream reaches the lands of an inferior heritor.

July 15, 1857. MR M'LEAN of Plantation brought this suspension in the following circumstances :—A stream runs through the lands of Plantation, which takes its rise near the Glasgow and Johnstone Canal ; and, before reaching Plantation, forms one boundary of the lands of Middleton, belonging to Mr Hamilton. For upwards of forty years there had been an occasional flow into the rivulet of surplus water from the canal. A few years ago, Mr Hamilton, with the view of improving his property, enclosed the stream in a brick sewer. Recently Mr Hamilton caused a pipe to be inserted in the arch of the sewer about eighteen inches from the bottom, so as in time of floods to draw off a part of the water. Mr M'Lean, complaining of this operation, presented a petition to the Sheriff of Lanarkshire, praying that the defender should be interdicted from withdrawing any portion of the water of said stream or rivulet, or diverting it from its usual and natural channel, in all time coming, without the petitioner's consent ; or performing any operations upon, or in reference to, said stream or rivulet, by which its natural course is disturbed, or its quantity diminished ; and that the defender should be ordained to restore the said sewer to the state in which it was before the introduction of such pipe for the purpose of diverting said stream.

The Sheriff-substitute (Steele) pronounced an interlocutor, which, after finding the circumstances above stated, " Finds that this operation" (the insertion of the pipe in the sewer) " was done without the consent and against the remonstrances of the pursuer : Finds, however, that no special damage has yet been occasioned to the pursuer, or at least if it has, no evidence thereof has been led : Finds, as matter of law, that the pursuer is entitled to have the full and undiminished flow of the stream continued to him in its usual channel, and that the defender has no right to deprive the pursuer thereof, by any opus manufacturæ, even although the effect thereof should be limited to the time of floods, or should not be equal to carrying off the casual supply obtained from the canal : Finds that the pursuer is

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.
R.

entitled to complain of the defender's foresaid operations in regard to the pipe sewer as an encroachment upon, and interference with, his right of property, even although no special damage has yet been occasioned or proved: Therefore interdicts the defender in the terms prayed for; ordains him also to restore in the terms prayed for: Finds him liable in expenses," &c.*

On an appeal against this interlocutor, the Sheriff "adhered thereto, for the reasons stated by the Sheriff-substitute, and dismissed the appeal." †

Mr Hamilton advocated; and the Lord Ordinary made avizandum to the Lords of the Second Division, in terms of the Sheriff-court Act.

The advocator argued;—The petitioner was not injured by the pipe complained of, which only drew off a part of the overflow of the rivulet during floods, and did not interfere with its ordinary flows. The interlocutor granting the interdict was too sweeping in its terms, and even interdicted the use of the water for domestic purposes.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—There can be no doubt on the general point involved here, that a superior heritor is not entitled to divert part of a stream to the injury of an inferior heritor. That the pipe complained of by Mr M'Lean is placed so as only to draw off part of what is in excess of the usual flow of this stream, does not make any difference. A flood may be of great value for the purpose of scouring or keeping clean a water-course. The terms of the interdict as it stands may be a little too broad; and it may perhaps be better that an interlocutor of adherence should bear to be without prejudice to all competent use of the stream by the superior heritor.

The other Judges concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Refuse the note of advocacy; adhere to the interlocutor complained of; and remit simpliciter to the Sheriff, without prejudice to the advocator using the water of the stream in question for domestic purposes, or other competent use of the same, provided the water be returned to the stream

* "NOTE.—There are numerous cases and other authorities establishing the lower heritor's right to prevent all interference by the upper heritor with a stream which is purely natural; and the recent case of Mackenzie v. Wodrop, 24th January 1854, 16 D. 381, and others there noticed, are equally conclusive as to a stream partly artificial, when possession has existed from time immemorial."

† "NOTE.—The rule of law is well fixed, that a conterminous proprietor is entitled to draw off part of the water of a running stream for the natural use of the adjacent proprietors in turning a mill, or the like; but if he does so, he must reconduct it, when it has served his purpose, into the original bed of the stream, to be of like use to the inferior heritors. It does not alter the case that the water so drawn off is not the natural flow of the stream, but the result of a flood, or water let in from a canal, or other artificial work in the upper part of the stream; for all such extra floodings form part of the stream when it reaches the party proposing to abstract it, and thus becomes subject to the common law on the point. The case of Linlithgow Loch, 13th November 1757, founded on by the respondent, seems at first sight very similar to this, but it relates to a loch of stagnant water, which is private, not publici juris; and the case of M'Kenzie, 24th January 1854, has applied the general law, in regard to running streams, to all streams, though partly natural and partly artificial. That case, it is true, related to a channel partly natural and partly artificial; but the principle fixed as to the one applies also to the other.—Bell's Principles, 1106, Lord Melville, 31st May 1842; Blantyre v. Deans, 28th January 1848—the latter of which was an authoritative decision. The question here is not for interdict against a superior heritor, to force him to let his artificial works, which have increased the natural flow of water, remain permanently, but with an inferior heritor, who claims right to divert part of the stream which comes down to him, as to which the law seems the same, whether the stream is entirely natural, or partly natural and partly artificial."

No. 228.

unpolluted: Find the advocator liable in the expenses in this Court," &c.

July 15, 1857.

Forbes v.
Campbell

GIBSON-CRAIG, DALZIEL, & BRODIE, W.S.—MORTON, WHITEHEAD, & GREIG, W.S.—Agents.

No. 229.

PATRICK FORBES, Suspender.—*Penney—Pattison.*COLIN M'LARTY OR M'LAVERTY CAMPBELL AND OTHERS, Respondents.—Macfarlane—Millar.

Process—Jury Trial—Issues.—In an action of count and reckoning against a party as a trustee, where the defender denied that he held that character, or had intromissions in it, the Court, on the ground that there were questions of fact apart from the accounting, which had to be ascertained at any rate (abs. Lord Justice-Clerk), sent to a jury issues, one of which was framed to ascertain the extent of the defender's intromissions.

Form of issue in an action of count and reckoning.

July 15, 1857.

2D DIVISION.
Ld. Mackenzie
L

COLIN M'LARTY OR M'LAVERTY CAMPBELL and others, all the children of the late Rev. Donald Campbell, and Mary Anne Brown M'Larty, his wife, brought an action of count and reckoning against James Watson, Patrick Forbes, and the said Rev. Donald Campbell, as trustees under the settlement of the late Miss Susannah Christiana M'Larty, who died in October 1847, concluding that they should hold count and reckoning for intromissions with the funds falling under the trust created by the settlement, and with the profits thereof, from 20th October 1847, and denude themselves of the trust, and convey in favour or for behoof of the pursuers, the fee or capital of the trust-funds equally among them, share and share alike; or otherwise to invest and secure it for behoof of the pursuers; and further, that they should pay to the pursuers L.400, or such sum as should appear to be the balance of their intromissions with the profits and produce of the trust-funds from and after 20th October 1847, to the date of the summons, after deducting any sums already paid; and further, hold count and reckoning for all future intromissions till the fee or capital should be paid over to the pursuers, and pay to the pursuers the annual interest or produce till division of the capital. And in the event of the defenders failing to account, the summons concluded alternatively that they should be decerned "conjunctly and severally, or severally and respectively, as might be determined in the course of the process," to make payment to the pursuers equally among them (1) of L.2700, which should in that event be held to be the amount of the capital of the trust-funds due by them, and (2) of L.600, which should in that event be held as the balance of the intromissions with the produce, together with interest on said sum from the date of citation. The action was defended by James Watson, but neither Donald Campbell nor Forbes made appearance. Decree in absence was taken against Forbes, in terms of the alternative conclusions, and the present action was a suspension of a charge upon that decree.

Forbes said that he had acted as agent of Miss M'Larty, and had, with her consent, made investments of her property; but he denied that he had accepted the office of trustee, or had had any intromissions under her settlement, and stated that, till stopped by legal proceedings, he had paid the interest of the funds invested by him to the chargers, or those acting in their names, and was willing still to pay the interest to any one who could give a discharge, or to pay over the principal to a curator bonis if appointed.

The chargers did not admit the suspender's statements, either as to the amount of the funds that had come into his hands, or as to the footing on which he had dealt with them.

Parties were ordered to lodge draft issues. This was done, and, in respect they could not agree as to the form of issues, the Lord Ordinary reported No. 229.

the case.

The following issue was proposed by the respondents, in which they were to be held as pursuers:—

July 15, 1857.
Forbes v.
Campbell.

“It being admitted that the defender, Patrick Forbes, along with others, was appointed a trustee and executor of the late Miss Susanna Christiana M'Larty, conform to trust-disposition, &c.:

“It being also admitted that the pursuers, the children of the marriage between the said Donald Campbell and Mrs Mary Anne Brown M'Larty or Campbell, are the beneficiaries under the said trust, to whom the said truster directed the residue of her estate to be paid on the death of their mother, the said deceased Mrs Anne Brown M'Larty or Campbell:

“Whether the defender, the said Patrick Forbes, accepted of the office of trustee, to which he was appointed by the said trust-disposition and settlement, and whether he retains possession of, and has intromitted with, the means and estate of the truster, the said Miss Susanna Christiana M'Larty, and has failed to account for the same? and is resting owing to the pursuers the sums set out in the annexed schedule, or any and what part thereof?”

“SCHEDULE.

“1. Amount of the capital of the trust-funds claimed from the defender,	L.2700	0	0
“2. Balance of interest claimed from the defender as due by him at the date of citation to the action, viz. 11th September 1855,	400	0	0
	<hr/>
	L.3100	0	0

“With interest on said sum of L.3100, from 11th September 1855, till paid.”

The following issue was proposed by the suspender:—

“It being admitted that the defender, Patrick Forbes, was, along with others, nominated as trustee and executor by the late Miss Susanna Christiana M'Larty, conform to trust-disposition, &c.:

“It being also admitted that the said Miss Susanna Christiana M'Larty died on the 20th day of October 1847, and that Mrs Mary Anne Brown M'Larty or Campbell died on the day of :

“It being also admitted that by the said trust-disposition and settlement the testatrix directed her trustees to hold and apply the residue of her estate, after payment of her debts, and any legacies she might leave in trust, for behoof of the said Mrs Mary Anne Brown M'Larty or Campbell in liferent, and to the heirs of her body in fee:

“Whether the pursuers, the children of the marriage between the said Donald Campbell and Mrs Mary Anne Brown M'Larty or Campbell, are fiars of, and became entitled, at the death of the testatrix, to the said residue?

“Whether the defender, the said Patrick Forbes, accepted of the office of trustee and executor under the said trust-disposition and settlement, and as trustee and executor foresaid intromitted with the means and estate of the truster since her death, and if so, to what extent?”

The suspender argued;—That this being a case of accounting, was not suited for trial by jury. Failure to account was not a jury question; the only question which could be so tried being whether a party had intromitted.

The respondent argued;—That it was neither incompetent nor unusual to send an accounting to a jury. The mode of procedure was a question of expediency, and was in the discretion of the Court.

LORD WOOD.—There is no exception of count and reckonings from the cases that may go to a jury. If this had been an ordinary accounting, we would probably not have made it a jury cause. But I think it proper and expedient that the issue,

No. 229. after putting the question whether the suspender had accepted the office of trustee, and intromitted as such, should also ask whether he had failed to account, and to what extent. If Mr Forbes succeeds in the first question, he will get the expense of both parts of the case, including that of preparing for the accounting. If he fails, the case may still be recommended at the trial as one more proper for an accountant than for a jury, and then Mr Forbes's preparations for the accounting won't be lost. I see no reason here to deviate from the ordinary course adopted in accountings, when there are previous facts to go to the jury before they come to the question of accounting.

July 16, 1857.
Granger v.
Geils.

LORD MURRAY and LORD COWAN concurred.

The following issue was approved of.—After the admissions as proposed by the suspender:—"Whether the pursuers, the said Colin M'Larty or M'Larty Campbell &c., are the whole children of the marriage between the said Donald Campbell and Mrs Mary Anne Brown M'Larty or Campbell; and whether the defender, the said Patrick Forbes, accepted of the office of trustee under the said trust disposition and settlement, and as such trustee has had intromissions with, and retains the means and estate of, the said truster, the said Miss Susannah Christiana M'Larty, and has failed to account for the same to the extent of the sums set out in the annexed schedule, or to any other and what extent?"

(Schedule as above.)

M'QUEEN & BRIDGEFORD, S.S.C.—MORTON, WHITEHEAD, & GREIG, W.S.—Agents.

No. 230. WILLIAM GRANGER SENIOR, AND WILLIAM GRANGER JUNIOR, Complainers—Penney—Scott.

JOHN EDWARD GEILS, Respondent.—Young—Mitford Morison.

Lease—Break—Verbal agreement.—By a written agreement between a landlord and tenant, each had right to put an end to the lease by giving written notice. The landlord gave a written notice, but did not follow it up by a removing, and the tenant continued to possess for some years;—the landlord again gave notice and brought a removing;—Held (aff. judgment of Lord Mackenzie) that the notice first given had not exhausted the landlord's power, so as to entitle the tenant to remain in possession till the ish fixed by the lease.

Question, whether by mere verbal agreement the clause containing the reserved power could be abrogated?

Process—Removing—Act of Sederunt 14th Dec. 1756, 16 & 17 Vict. c. 80, act 29—Warning.—Held (1), that in an action of removing it is not necessary to libel specially on the Act of Parliament; and (2), that although the Act of Sederunt was libelled on, the provisions of sect. 29 of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 80 were not excluded as to the execution of a summons forty days before Martinmas.

Question, whether written notice of intention to remove be equivalent to warning?

Process—Interim execution pending appeal—Interim management.—The Court may grant interim management pending appeal where they would refuse interim execution. They cannot remit to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills during vacation to dispose of a question of interim execution, which can only be granted in the Inner-House, and by four Judges.

July 16, 1857. THE complainers became tenants of the farm of Dumbuck, the property of the respondent, under a minute of agreement of let, dated 17th February 1848, for the period of nineteen years from the term of Martinmas 1847. at the slump yearly rent of L.355.

1st DIVISION.
Ld. Mackenzie
L.

Thereafter disputes arose between the parties—the landlord, on the one hand, claiming arrears of rent from the tenants, and the latter preferring certain claims of damages against the landlord; and by another minute of agreement, dated 26th and 30th May 1851, they mutually discharged their claims against each other, and declared, "that the terms and conditions of the said minute of agreement of let shall continue in full force, with the exceptions after stated." Among these exceptions was the following:—

 "The first and second parties reserve to themselves the power of putting an end to the said lease, by either of the parties giving twelve months' notice, in writing, to the other, of such intention; but it is declared that no notice of this intention will avail to either party, if given before the 1st day of May 1852."

No. 230.

July 16, 1857.
 Granger v.
 Geils.

On the 13th of May 1852, and founding upon the said reserved power, the respondent's agent gave written notice to the complainers of the respondent's intention to put an end to the lease at the terms of Martinmas 1853 as to the arable land, and of Whitsunday thereafter as to the houses and grass; and he required them to flit and remove from the farm at the said terms accordingly. This notice was not followed up by any removing, or other proceedings for that purpose, but negotiations appear to have taken place between the parties with a view to an arrangement. No new written agreement was, however, entered into, and the complainers continued to possess the farm under the two minutes of agreement above mentioned.

On 1st October 1855 the respondent, founding upon the same reserved power, again gave written notice to the complainers of his intention to put an end to the lease of the said farm and pertinents at the term of Martinmas 1856, as regarded the arable lands, and at the term of Whitsunday 1857, as regarded the houses, yards, and grass, and required them to flit and remove themselves, families, servants, goods and gear, furth and from the said farm and pertinents at the said respective terms.

The complainers having intimated that they did not intend to remove under this notice, the respondent, on 11th June 1856 (being more than forty days before the first term of removal), executed a summons of removing against them, founding upon both the minutes of agreement, the second notice, and the Act of Sederunt of 14th December 1756, and concluding for decree of removing at the terms specified in the notice. To this action, which was raised in the Sheriff-court of Dumbartonshire, the complainers lodged defences, and a record was made up and closed, in which the pleas maintained by both parties were substantially the same as in the present suspension. The Sheriff-substitute pronounced decree of removing, in terms of the conclusions of the libel, with expenses; and the Sheriff-depute adhered, on appeal.

Against this decree of removing the complainers presented the present note of suspension, in which they set forth the provisions of the foresaid two minutes of agreement, and the foresaid first and second notices given by the respondent; and they also alleged specially, as regards the first notice,—
 "The respondent did not remove the complainers at the time so determined, nor avail himself of the break so fixed by him, nor of the power so acquired of removing the complainers at said terms. But, on the expiry of the currency of said notice or intimation, he allowed them to continue to occupy and possess the farm under the terms and conditions of the foresaid minutes of agreement, and recognised and treated them as still his tenants under the same. The complainers thus again became the respondent's tenants on the same terms as under the lease which had determined, or otherwise the right reserved to the respondent under the foresaid provision or exception was thus exhausted or extinguished; and the complainers were thereafter entitled, and were to be permitted to occupy the farm under said lease till the expiry of the full term of nineteen years from Martinmas 1847 and Whitsunday 1848. This was perfectly understood, both by the respondent and the complainers; and the said understanding was expressed as well as acted on and recognised by both parties in their dealings and transactions with each other, in reliance on the lease running on for nineteen years, and on the said understanding so expressed, acted on, and recognised by the respondent as well as

No. 230. the complainers, the complainers proceeded to cultivate the farm on a system adapted to a lease for such a period, and to make important improvements upon the lands. In particular, they took in about thirty acres of land on Dumbuck Hillside, that had never before been broken or cultivated. Further, at the respondent's desire, the complainers pulled up and rooted out 100 roods of old hedge at a cost of 5s. per rood. They also drained to a considerable extent, and brought in a considerable quantity of ground in several fields, besides the hillside ground already referred to." They also made many other improvements.

July 16, 1857.
Granger v.
Geils.

"The respondent Mr Geils was fully aware of all these improvements made by the complainers, and that the said acts were done and improvements made by them, in reliance on the foresaid understanding, and in consequence of its being expressed, acted on, and recognised, by the respondent as aforesaid, and of his treating the complainers as his tenants under the foresaid lease having an endurance of nineteen years. The respondent resides at the place, and saw and approved of said actings and improvements, and of their being so done and made. He took the benefit accruing to him from the same. He also allowed credit for the part payable by him upon the outlay for manures, and accepted the subsequent rents payable under the foresaid minutes of agreement without qualification."

They pleaded;—That the summons in the inferior Court being expressly founded on the minutes of agreement, the notice, and the Act of Sederunt 1756, and on these alone, it was incompetent for the respondent to found on any other act, or the warnings introduced by any other act; that the notice under the agreement merely fixed the ish of the lease, and that legal warning, besides such notice, was necessary, under the Act of Sederunt, and had not been given; that, supposing the Act of Sederunt 1856 to rule, the proceedings were not sufficient and formal under that Act; that the respondent's reserved power of removal was exhausted under the first notice, and that the second notice was, therefore, incompetent, and the complainers were entitled to remain till the natural expiry of the lease; that the respondent had, subsequently to the first notice, dealt with the complainers on the footing that they were to be permitted to remain till the expiry of the full period of the endurance of the lease, and so was barred from removing them; lastly, that, at all events, the note should be passed ob contingentiam of the dependence of a process of declarator at the complainers' instance, against the respondent, the object of which action was to have it found that the respondent's first notice had exhausted his reserved power of removing.

On the other hand, the respondent, in his answers, founded upon the Act 16 & 17 Vict. cap. 80, sect. 29, which enacts, with respect to actions of removing before the Sheriff-court, that "it shall be competent to raise a summons of removing at any time, provided there be an interval of at least forty days between the date of the execution of the summons and the notice of removal; or, where there is a separate ish, as regards lands and houses or otherwise, between the date of the execution of the summons and the ish which is first in date."

The respondent pleaded;—That the notice of October 1855 was valid, and had effectually put an end to the lease; that, under the Act of Sederunt 1756, or otherwise, no warning, in addition to said notice, was necessary to entitle the respondent to remove his tenants; that the delivery of said notice, of itself, constituted valid and sufficient warning to the tenants; and, lastly, that the summons of removing having been executed forty days before Martinmas, being the ish first in date, no further or other warning was requisite, under the recent Act of Parliament, and that it was unnecessary in the summons to libel upon said Act.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Refuses the note: Finds the complainers liable in expenses: Allows an account," No. 230. &c. *

July 16, 1857.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I confess that I do not feel much difficulty about this case. The interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary is right. As to that clause in the minute of agreement of May 1851, that the first and second parties reserve to themselves the power, &c.—(reads)—I cannot hold that such power was exhausted by the party giving notice, and not following it out by an action of removing, and thereby put-Granger v. Geils.

* "NOTE.—After carefully considering the whole proceedings in this case, the Lord Ordinary sees no ground for disturbing the judgment of the Sheriff.

"By the agreement of May 1851, the parties reserved power to put an end to the lease, by either of them giving twelve months notice in writing to the other of such intention, subject only to this condition, that no such notice should be available if given before 1st May 1852. On the 1st October 1855, the respondent gave notice in writing to the complainers that it was his intention to put an end to the lease at Martinmas 1856 as regards the arable land, and at Whitsunday 1857 as regards the houses and grass, and required the tenants to remove from the premises at these terms. Founding on this notice, the respondent raised and executed a summons of removing against the complainers on 11th June 1856, being much more than forty days prior to Martinmas 1856, being the first term of removal.

"1st, It is objected by the complainers, that the respondent having, in May 1852, given notice in writing of his intention to terminate the lease, and afterwards passed from that notice, his power to put an end to the lease before its natural expiry is exhausted. To the Lord Ordinary this objection does not appear to be well founded. It is an express condition of the agreement of May 1851, that, after 1st May 1852, the lease may be brought to an end by either party at any time on giving twelve months notice in writing. This is just a conventional break, which may be exercised either by the proprietor or the tenants at the end of each year, upon giving a previous written notice of twelve months. Where a notice has been given and afterwards waived, or passed from by consent of both parties, it cannot, of course, be founded on to any effect; but this cannot deprive either party of his right to bring the lease to a close by giving a new notice in any future year, under the general power reserved in the agreement of 1851. The circumstance that the proprietor gave notice in 1852, and passed from it with consent of the tenants, could not prevent them in any future year, if they saw it for their interest, from availing themselves of the break in the agreement, by giving notice of their intention to terminate the lease, and the same right belongs to the proprietor. The waiver of the notice in 1852 cannot be held in law equivalent to a relinquishment of the break, or the right to give notice to terminate the lease in any future year.

"2d, As notice, in writing, to remove was duly given in October 1855, and the summons of removing was executed in June 1856, more than forty days before the first term of removal, being Martinmas 1856, the Lord Ordinary holds that no further warning was required to entitle the respondent to decree of removing.

"The Act of Sederunt 1756 required the action of removing to be called in Court forty days before Whitsunday, in order to be equivalent to a warning under the statute 1555. This was found to be attended with inconvenience, and a remedy was accordingly provided by the Act 16 & 17 Vict., c. 80, sect. 29, which enacts, that 'it shall be competent to raise a summons of removing at any time, provided there be an interval of at least forty days between the date of the execution of the summons and the term of removal, or when there is a separate lease as regards land and houses, or otherwise, between the date of the execution of the summons and the lease which is first in date.' The Lord Ordinary apprehends that, according to the sound construction of this enactment, if the summons of removing be executed in proper time, no further warning is required.

"It is true the summons of removing does not expressly libel on the recent statute; but it is thought this was not essential, and that the objections to the form of the summons are not entitled to any weight.

"On these grounds the Lord Ordinary has no hesitation in refusing the note."

No. 230. ting an end to the lease. The power that is reserved is of putting an end to the lease. It is said that such power can only be exercised once. But that power never was exercised. I cannot hold, that the party giving the notice was precluded from effectually giving a new notice, either because of such notice not being given at the proper time, or of his having passed from his right to give it. That is substantially the ground of the declarator. Then it is said, that there was a subsequent agreement, and acting thereon. That is not specifically enough set forth. Whether the party was misled, so as to entitle him to other remedies, is a different question. But there is nothing libelled which can do away with the previous conditions of the lease.

July 16, 1857.
Granger v.
Geils.

Again, it is objected, that the summons of removing is rested on the Act of Sederunt of 1756, but that there was no previous warning. Now, the answer is satisfactory. The state of the law before the late statute regulating proceedings in the Sheriff-court was, that under that Act of Sederunt a party could bring an action of removing forty days before Whitsunday, without having preceded it by formal warning. That was dispensing with the warning, &c., required by the statute 1555. But it was found inconvenient that such notice should be brought forty days before Whitsunday, when, perhaps, the term of removal was Martinmas, and, in order to remedy that inconvenience, the Act of Parliament was passed which placed the matter on a more reasonable footing, which was to give the party notice by summons of removing, forty days before the term at which he was actually to remove. That is now the law, and the objection here is, that the pursuer libelled on the Act of Sederunt, but not also upon the alterations on it introduced by the Act of Parliament. That does not tie the party up to this, that he must now proceed on the Act of Sederunt. There are two views—1st, The Act of Sederunt is now modified by an Act of Parliament, which Act it was not necessary specially to libel on; or, 2d, If the Act of Sederunt was referred to, it was of none avail, because there is the Act of Parliament which gives the party the positive power of raising a summons of removing at any time, provided there be an interval of at least forty days between the date of the execution of the summons and the first term of removal. This was the case here. Therefore I think that this interlocutor refusing to pass the note should be adhered to.

In a question of suspension in an action of removing, which has been fully litigated in the inferior court, it is a grave matter to pass the note in such a case, because to do so is substantially a decision against the landlord; and I do not think that the tenants having brought a declarator is any reason for passing the note, for in that way it would always be in the power of a party to hang up a process of removing by bringing an action of declarator; but when I look into the declarator, I see that it is rested substantially on the construction put on the minute of lease, as to which I have a very decided opinion; and therefore, upon the whole, I think the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary must be adhered to.

LORD IVORY.—I concur.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—I am also of the same opinion as to the first question. Power is reserved to either party to put an end to the lease. This was under the existing agreement, as we are told by the suspenders themselves on the record. The landlord gave a notice in 1852. Possibly the tenant might have objected to this first notice being departed from, and have insisted on its being carried out. I do not, however, require to decide that point. But it was departed from, and now the tenant pleads that the power can only be exercised once. That is true, because when once the power is exercised, the lease is at an end for altogether. But here the lease continued after the notice, with the reserved power in it, and forming a part of it.

Then, as to the technical objection, the Act of Sederunt does not require previous warning; the summons of removing is declared to be equal to warning, if raised forty days before Whitsunday. But the Act of Parliament is a good answer to the objection taken against the time at which this action was raised.

LORD DEAS.—I agree with your Lordships. The argument for the complainer resolves into three objections:—1st, That the clause in the lease empowering either party to terminate it by notice was exhausted by the notice of 13th May 1852. 2d, That it was agreed this should be so, and that the lease in future should subsist without the clause. 3d, That due warning has not been given in terms of the Act No. 230. of Sederunt 1756.

Now, if the first notice had taken effect, the power would, no doubt, have been exhausted. But I cannot hold that a notice which proved abortive (for what reason is not stated), with the acquiescence of both parties, exhausts the power. There is no mala fides, oppression, or abuse alleged to raise a special case; and, on the contrary, we see from the correspondence that the parties were negotiating till the period for enforcing the notice expired; and the landlord obviously thought it safer to give a new notice than attempt to proceed upon the old. 2d, Assuming, as we must now do, that the clause was not exhausted by the first notice, I am not prepared to say that the parties could, by a verbal agreement, drop that clause out of the lease, which would virtually have been to make a new lease for the remainder of the nineteen years. But it is unnecessary to consider this, because there is no distinct or even intelligible allegation of any such agreement, and the pleas in law shew that the complainer did not mean to make any such allegation, but only to allege an understanding proved rebus ipsis et factis, which will obviously not do in the face of the written lease. 3d, As to the objection under the Act of Sederunt, I reserve my opinion, as I understand Lord Curriehill does also, whether the notice served here could be regarded as a warning in terms of that Act. I think it enough that the enactment in the statute 16 & 17 Vict. cap. 80, is general in its terms, and declares it to be sufficient that the summons of removing shall be executed forty days before the term of removal. The summons is unskilfully framed, for if the Act of Parliament was not to be libelled on, so neither ought the Act of Sederunt. But I do not think this amounts to any such defect or informality as to void the procedure, which is otherwise regular.

July 16, 1857.
Swan v.
Carruthers.

The Court refused the reclaiming note, and found additional expenses due.

The complainers having intimated an appeal, the case came again before the Court on a petition by Geils, praying the Court "to authorise and direct the Lord Ordinary officiating on the Bills to approve of the Auditor's report," and decern for expenses; "and to allow decree to go out and be extracted, and to grant interim execution," both in the suspension and in the removing, "and that notwithstanding said appeal; or otherwise, pending said appeal, to sequester the farm," and appoint a "judicial factor or manager thereon."

This petition was opposed.¹

LORD PRESIDENT.—We cannot at once invert possession here; besides, the prayer asks us to delegate our powers to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills, whereas the statute provides that a quorum of four Judges can alone grant interim execution.

LORD IVORY.—Then, on the merits, we cannot hear parties this session.

LORD DEAS.—If the petition had been merely for interim management, we might have disposed of it; but it is for interim execution, and that part of the prayer is not departed from.

ANSWERS were ordered to be lodged by the first box-day.

WOTHERSPOON & MACK, W.S.—DOUGLAS & MONILAW, W.S.—Agents.

JOHN SWAN, Pursuer.—Moir.

JOHN CARRUTHERS, Defender.—Gifford.

No. 231.

Process—13 & 14 Vict. c. 36, sect. 13—Removal to Inner House—Commission to take evidence.—Question, Whether a Lord Ordinary who has decided the relevancy of a case can, pending a reclaiming note against his judgment, grant commission to take evidence to lie in retentis.

THIS was an action of reduction on the ground of fraud and error. A record was made up and closed, and the defender's first plea was, that there

July 16, 1857.
1st Division.
Lord Neaves.

¹ 48 Geo. III. c. 151.

No. 231. were no relevant grounds stated to support the conclusions. The Lord Ordinary repelled this plea, and the defender boxed a reclaiming note to the First Division, which was ordered to the roll.

July 16, 1857.
Robertson v.
Galbraith.

While the reclaiming note was undisposed of, the defender applied to the Lord Ordinary for a commission to take the evidence of aged witnesses, to lie in retentis. He founded on the 13th section of the 13 & 14 Vict., c. 36, which provides that no reclaiming note shall be held to remove the process from before the Lord Ordinary "as regards any point or points not necessarily dependent on the interlocutor so submitted to review, but such process shall, for all purposes and to all effects not necessarily dependent on such interlocutor, remain before the Lord Ordinary," "and shall be proceeded in by him notwithstanding such reclaiming note, if it appeared to the Lord Ordinary or the Court to be expedient and proper."

The Lord Ordinary reported the matter verbally to the Court, stating that he had doubts whether he could himself grant the commission. If the defender succeeded in his reclaiming note, there was an end of the case; and hence the taking of evidence, as well as everything else, was "necessarily dependent on the interlocutor" under review.

THE COURT waived deciding the point whether the Lord Ordinary had power or not, but themselves, on the report of the Lord Ordinary, granted the defender's motion.

RANKEN, WALKER, & JOHNSTON, W.S.—W. S. STUART, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 232.

ALEXANDER ROBERTSON, Pursuer.—A. B. Shand.
ROBERT GALBRAITH, Defender.—Logan.

Reparation—Wrongous use of diligence—Relevancy—Issues.—Allegations to the effect that in a sequestration for rent, owing to the sale having been misconducted with the view of injuring the tenant, his stocking did not bring a fair price, and was sold to the value of double the rent sequestered for,—Held relevant to support conclusions for damages against the landlord both for the sacrifice of the property and for solatium. Form of issues adjusted.

Question, Is the pursuer of a sequestration responsible for the proceedings of the auctioneer who carries out the sale?

July 16, 1857. THE pursuer became tenant under missives of lease of twenty acres of nursery ground near Govan, the property of the defender, for twenty-five years from Martinmas 1847, at which term he entered to the ground, and fully stocked it with the plants necessary for carrying on his business of a nurseryman and gardener. The rent was payable half-yearly, and was regularly paid up to the term of Candlemas 1855, when the rent due for the six months preceding Martinmas 1854, amounting to L.55, 10s. 6d., was not paid. In order to recover the rent the defender used sequestration. In this action the pursuer concluded for reparation and damages in respect of the wrongous use of sequestration, and illegal and oppressive conduct in carrying it through.

2D DIVISION.
Ld. Ardmillan.
R.

The pursuer made the following statement:—The defender, on 10th February 1855, applied to the Sheriff of Lanarkshire for sequestration of the plants, crop, implements, &c., on the ground occupied by the pursuer, for payment of the rent thereof due at Martinmas 1854, and for sequestration of his household furniture and effects, for a rent of L.15 alleged to be due for his house,—and in security of the rents to become due at Whitsunday and Martinmas 1855. Of the same date, a copy of the petition for sequestration was served upon the pursuer, and the stock of plants, &c. inventoried and secured. On 9th March warrant to sell was granted to John Morrison.

auctioneer; on the following day it was intimated to the pursuer that the sale would take place on the 16th of March. No. 232.

It was averred that this was too early a day to obtain fair prices; that no one came till within half an hour of the sale to arrange as to the lots in which the effects were to be exposed, or to make such arrangements as were absolutely necessary in order to secure a fair price. Upon the arrival of the auctioneer the pursuer suggested that the stock should be set up in lots to suit the class of purchasers present, and offered to assist in arranging them; "but his suggestions were disregarded, and his services declined; the auctioneer stating, in presence of the parties assembled, that he had his instructions from the defender, and must not be interfered with." Immediately before commencing the sale, the auctioneer announced the following conditions:—"1st, That on a purchase a deposit of one-third of the price should at once be paid in cash, and the remainder before the removal of the articles purchased; and 2d, That the lots purchased should be removed within twenty-four hours."

July 16, 1857.
Robertson v.
Galbraith.

These conditions, it was alleged, were calculated to prevent fair prices being obtained, intending purchasers present being unprovided with the deposit of cash required, and it being impossible, without great loss, to remove the trees, &c. within so short a time; and "though the pursuer, as possessor of the ground, intimated his willingness to allow a longer time for the removal of the plants, the auctioneer, as representing the defender, intimated his adherence to these conditions." The defender's object was to compel the pursuer at all hazards to renounce his possession. In this expectation, and with the view of being able to treat on more favourable terms with an incoming tenant, or otherwise to possess himself of the most valuable part of the pursuer's stock, the defender had the son of his own gardener present instructed to purchase, and who did purchase for his behoof, at inadequate prices, the greater part of the stock." The conduct of the sale was such as to call forth the frequent animadversions of the company. "The auctioneer farther, at an early part of the roup, warned the company that they were in danger to bid for certain lots, as they were liable to be again sequestered on the following day for rents due to the landlord—this had the effect of preventing sales." Several lots were condescended on as worth in all L.180, but which were knocked down for about L.7, 10s.; and it was alleged that the property had been sacrificed to the amount of at least L.700.

The sum realised at the sale amounted to L.105, almost double the rent for payment of which the defender was entitled to sell. The pursuer denied that he was due the rent for which the sequestration of his furniture and household effects had been granted. Besides the sum of L.700 claimed for pecuniary loss sustained by the misconduct of the sale, L.500 was claimed as solatium and damages for injury to feelings and reputation through the defender's oppressive conduct.

The defender's first plea was, that the grounds of action were irrelevant. The Lord Ordinary ordered the pursuer, before answer, to prepare draft issues; and the following were lodged, having prefixed to them an admission of the sequestration and warrant of sale:—

"1. Whether the defender, on or about the 16th March 1855, in carrying out a sale under the said warrant, acted wrongfully and oppressively in the sale of property and effects belonging to the pursuer, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer?

"2. Whether the defender, in carrying out the said sale, wrongfully and illegally disposed of property and effects belonging to the pursuer, to an extent exceeding the sums for which the said warrant of sale had been granted, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer?

No. 232.

July 16, 1857.
Robertson v.
Galbraith.

“ Damages under the first issue, L.750.

“ Do. under the second issue, L.500.”

After hearing parties on the relevancy, the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor :—“ Finds that the pursuer has alleged facts relevant to support the conclusions of the action : Therefore repels the first plea in law for the defender ; and appoints the cause to be enrolled for the adjustment of issues : Reserves the question of expenses.” *

The defender reclaimed, and contended ;—That he was not responsible for the proceedings of the auctioneer, who, acting under the Sheriff’s warrant, was an officer of Court ; but there had been nothing illegal in those proceedings. The warrant did not specify any particular time at which the sale should take place. The conditions of sale were usual ; and the provision that purchasers should pay for the goods before removal was necessary to prevent fraud. The excess of the price brought by the goods sold over the rent sued for had been overstated by the pursuer. There was always some excess to cover expenses ; and in this case the excess had been consigned. This case was proper for disposal by the Court, and ought not to be sent to a jury.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I do not think we can hold that there is not matter averred on this record that should go to proof. A creditor is bound to proceed with due regard to the interests of his debtor, when it is necessary, in order to save himself from loss, that the former should bring to sale pointed effects. I think there is matter here that should go to a jury, but not under the issues proposed by the pursuer. The second issue, as to whether there was a sale of effects to an amount exceeding the sum for which warrant of sale was granted, will not do. That would entitle the pursuer to a verdict, if there was excess, however small. There must always be excess to a certain amount ; but it must be shewn that the sale was conducted illegally and oppressively, and with disregard of the interests of the pursuer, to entitle him to damages.

LORD MURRAY.—A landlord is always entitled to get his rent. In the steps he may take to enforce his right, he may require to use harsh measures ; or he may do what is illegal, with the view of driving the tenant from his possession ; whether he has done so is matter for a jury.

LORD WOOD concurred.

LORD COWAN.—I have much difficulty, and I do not state an opinion as to the liability of the defender for the proceedings of the auctioneer. I think the issue amended as suggested may properly try the cause.

THE COURT adhered to the Lord Ordinary’s judgment, and approved of the following issue, with the admissions prefixed, to the effect above noticed :—

“ Whether the defender, on or about the 16th of March 1855, in selling part of the sequestrated effects under the said warrant, did illegally and oppressively sell the same, in disregard of the interests of the pursuer, and in a manner to produce loss, injury, and damage to the pursuer ?

“ Damages laid at L.500.”

MORTON, WHITEHEAD, & GREIG, W.S.—J. W. & J. MACKENZIE, W.S.—Agents.

* “ NOTE.—The second issue proposed by the pursuer seems correct and suitable. The first issue may require adjustment—the word ‘ illegally,’ as well as ‘ wrongfully and oppressively,’ is on the record, and should be in the issue, if that issue is to be pressed. The Lord Ordinary is not prepared to refuse action altogether to the pursuer, in regard to the matters referred to in the first issue. But harsh and vexatious procedure, without illegality, is not of itself a ground of action ; and it is only by averring an oppressive motive, and, in pursuance thereof, a wilful and wrongful departure from settled customary practice, that the pursuer has, on this head, made out a relevant case. The issue ought to embrace the elements from which illegality is deduced.”

MRS CATHERINE ANNE CAMPBELL OR COCHRANE, AND OTHERS, Pursuers.— No. 233.

Pyper—Patton—Wood.

JAMES BLACK, JUNIOR, AND JAMES SPENS BLACK, Defenders.—Logan—
A. Moncreiff.

July 16, 1857.
Cochrane v.
Black.

Trust—Wrongful investment of funds—Partnership—Capital—Accounting.—

Two partners of a mercantile firm, who were appointed trustees under a settlement, and employed the trust-funds in their business, paying five per cent to the beneficiaries, were held bound to pay in addition any profits over and above five per cent realised by such use of the funds;—Held, that in ascertaining the amount of profits made on the trust-funds, there must be taken into account, not only input capital of the partners, but all other funds obtained on loan, or otherwise, and invested in the partnership business; and that the proportion which the trust-mones bore to the whole funds so employed regulates the share of profits to be made over to the beneficiaries under the trust;—the Court being of opinion, and that the capital input under the contract of copartnery, and periodical dooquets fixing the interests of the partners in the excess of property over liabilities, however binding inter socios, were of no importance in such a question as the present, with third parties, who were not entitled to share in the profits, on the footing of having been partners.

SEE ante, vol. xvii. p. 321.

“The Court having in this case, on 1st February 1855, found that the defenders, who had used L.1000 of trust-funds in their hands, ‘as part of the stock or capital of the company of which they were partners in its ordinary trade and business, are liable to account for, and bound to make forthcoming, any profits made on the funds so employed over and above the five per cent of interest paid to the pursuers,’ remitted the case to an accountant, “to examine the books of the company or companies in which the defenders, or either of them, were partners at any time since the death of the truster; and to report what amount of profit, if any, was made on the proportion of the capital in trade representing the trust-funds used by the defenders in their trade during said period, after deducting five per cent per annum from the profits on said proportion of capital, if profit was made, and also to report what was the proportional interest in the said company or companies of any other persons, partners therein of the defenders, or either of them,” &c.

2d DIVISION.
Ld. Benholme.
R.

From the report prepared under this remit, it appears that the concern of John Black and Company existed for a considerable time prior to the death of the truster, Mr Campbell, which took place on June 19, 1845, and at that date consisted of the following gentlemen, as partners, viz.:—

1. James Black, senior, holding two-fifth shares of the business. 2. James Black, junior, with a like proportion; and, 3. James Spens Black, holding one-fifth share.

This concern existed till the 1st January 1847, when James Black, junior, retired. The remaining partners continued the business till 1st January 1848, the senior partner holding two-third shares, and the junior partner holding one-third share of the business. At this date Mr Black, senior, retired, leaving Mr James Spens Black as sole partner. A new partnership was then formed, by the admission, at the same period, of Mr Robert Strang Robertson. By the contract of copartnery, it was provided inter alia, Primo, “The capital stock of the company shall consist of L.14,000 sterling, one-half whereof shall be put into the stock by each party.” “Nono, The said James Black (the retiring partner), and Hugh Robertson (the new partner’s father), have agreed, and hereby agree, each to lend to the said company the sum of L.5000 sterling during the subsistence of the said contract,” &c. This concern has continued since, and is the one now in operation.

No. 233.
 —
 July 16, 1857.
 Cochrane v.
 Black.

There was no written contract of copartnery prior to 1848, and as the profit or loss of the business was divided, not according to the capital each had in the concern, but by fractional shares of the half yearly results of the business, the accountant said he had experienced "some difficulty in fixing what at each balance formed the capital of the company. He has arrived clearly at the conclusion that the capital of the company must be taken as it ordinarily stood in the books at the periodical balances, made without reference to any question such as the one involved in the present proceedings having been in contemplation."

At each half-yearly investigation a docquet was placed in the balance-book, and signed by the partners, in which the capital held by each is specifically referred to. The one immediately preceding the date of the truster's death is dated the 30th of April 1845, and was in the following terms:—

"Glasgow, 1st May 1845.—We have examined the balance as stated above, and also in the other books of the company, and find all correct to the best of our knowledge. James Black senior has at the credit of his account, at this date, the sum of L.25,013, 14s. 3d., being the amount of his capital in the firm of John Black and Company. James Black junior has at the debit of his account L.6111, 3s. 7d. sterling, owing by him to the aforesaid company, and the amount of James Spens Black's capital in the firm of John Black and Company, is L.1117, 15s. 4d. sterling. In proof of which witness our hands. (Signed) JAMES BLACK, JAMES BLACK junior, JAMES SPENS BLACK."

The accountant remarked,—“From the state of the partners' accounts referred to in the foregoing docquet, it appears that the sums stated therein as forming the capital of the partners, is brought out in the following manner, viz. :—

“Amount of debts and assets due to the company at 30th April 1845,	L.64,357 12 7
Amount of debts due by the company,	38,226 3 0

Showing the stock held by the partners in the com- pany to be	26,131 9 7
--	---	---	---	---	------------

Divisible in the following proportions :—

James Black senior, for his share,	L.25,013 14 3
James Spens Black, ditto,	1,117 15 4
	<hr/>	26,131 9 7

“At the half-yearly investigations which took place between the date of the above docquet and 1st January 1848, when James Black senior ceased to be a partner, docquets of a similar character to the above were signed by the partners. From the contents of these docquets, containing, as they do, evidence of the views of the partners, it may be fairly inferred that the sums named therein are to be taken as representing what the partners themselves considered to be the capital at each balance of the company's affairs.

“In ascertaining the profits due to the pursuers on their proportion of capital in the hands of the company, the reporter has therefore adopted the sums stated in the docquets above referred to, as the periodical capital of the company, and the calculations which follow (in appendices to the report) are founded on the principle of adding the sums of capital as stated in these docquets to the trust-funds and ascertained profits of the pursuers.”

The following extracts from “the general balance-book” and “private journal” of John Black and Company may be taken as specimens of each half-yearly settlement :—

No. 233.

Dr.	31st December 1849.	Cr.
Cash account, . . .	£ 779 19 5	Private Ledger, . . . £26,820 14 8
Bills receivable, . . .	1,788 9 6	James Black, deceased, . . . 4,994 16 0
Cloth account, . . .	19,696 0 0	Hugh Robertson, . . . 5,000 0 0
Dye stuffs account, . . .	1,581 14 1	Mrs Cochran, . . . 998 0 0
Goods account, . . .	17,166 16 0	Bills payable, . . . 27,902 14 6
Utensil account, . . .	8,866 6 6	Debts due to sundries (as per Milngavie building account, . . .	2,778 0 0	detailed list in Balance-book), 560 11 8
Milngavie house account, . . .	50 0 0
Western Bank Stock, . . .	3,320 0 0
Western Bank, . . .	990 0 0
Adventures, per "Amiga," &c. . .	1,093 3 3
Adventure to Sydney, . . .	425 10 1 Debts due by sundries (as per detailed list in Balance-book), 7,745 18 0
	<hr/>	<hr/>
	£66,276 16 10	£66,276 16 10

JOHN BLACK & Co.
JAMES SPENS BLACK.
JOHN BLACK & Co.
R. S. ROBERTSON.

“ We have examined the balance, as contained particularly in our balance-book and the other books of the company, and have found the same, to the best of our knowledge, correct; and we hereby declare it to be a just and true statement of our affairs as at 31st December 1849. The amount of net free capital in the business being L.26,820, 14s. 8d. sterling; and of which capital L.13,448, 15s. 0½d. belongs to James Spens Black, and L.13,371, 19s. 7½d. to Robert Strang Robertson. Witness our hands, this twenty-third day of January, in the year of our Lord eighteen hundred and fifty. We have also subscribed our balance-book and private ledger as relative hereto.

‘ JAMES SPENS BLACK.

The accountant's report contained his views on many points not noticed above. Objections were lodged both by the pursuers and defenders—those relating to the principle to be followed in fixing the amount of the stock in reference to which the profits payable to the pursuer are to be ascertained, are the only ones discussed.

The pursuers admitted ;—" That the report is correct in taking the balances in the books of Black and Co., as shewing the amount of their stock or capital to which the trust-funds fall to be added in the distribution of profits, down to the formation of the existing company in 1848, during which period there was no contract of copartnery fixing the amount of capital." But they contended ;—That subsequently to 1st January 1848, the stock of the company must be held to have been fixed and limited to L.14,000 sterling, by the deed of partnership of that date, and that the Accountant had erred in adopting the balances as his guide after that period.

The defenders stated their views thus : — “ The capital stock or plant of the company consisted partly of funds contributed by the partners individually, partly of funds acquired in loan from friends or from banks, and (since 1845) of the L.1000 belonging to the pursuers. The whole formed together an aggregate fund, by the employment of all of which the profit of the year was made. But the Accountant regards as capital only the sums which the partners themselves contributed. And at the same time he excludes from the computation all the other funds on which the company actually traded. Yet, on the mere statement of the thing, it is apparent that these last contributed to produce the profits, as much as did the former ; and that in precise proportion to their respective amounts. He has taken as the exclusive basis of his computation certain docquets in the company’s books, intended to shew,

No. 233. and actually shewing, the input capital of the individual partners, instead of certain other docquets in the same books, in which are stated the various items which composed the entire capital stock on which the company traded, and by the use of the whole of which their profits were acquired." Then, after referring to the docquet of 31st December 1849, and the excerpt from the balance-book of that date, they said it was by trading on a capital stock of (including the L.1000 of trust-funds) L.66,276, 16s. 10d. that the company earned the profits of that half year. "This would yield to the pursuer, as her proportion of the profit, one sixty-sixth share. But what the Accountant proposes to be done is to give her one twenty-seventh share.

July 16, 1857.
Cochrane v.
Black.

"This result he reaches in this way:—Looking exclusively to the docquet, he finds the input funds of the individual partners to amount (in round numbers) to L.26,000. To this sum he adds L.1000, the amount of the trust-fund, — thus obtaining L.27,000; and, as a thousand is just the twenty-seventh part of twenty-seven thousand, he gives to the pursuer one twenty-seventh share."

The case having been argued, minutes of debate were ordered in respect of Judges being equally divided in opinion upon the point "what the stock was by which the profits of the concern were produced."

In the paper lodged for the pursuer it was argued;—The first thing to be ascertained by the Accountant in carrying out the remit was the amount of "capital" of Black and Company, and after comparing the definitions in commercial and legal works¹ it was assumed to be "the free amount or balance of property realised or valued after deduction of debts and liabilities." To this amount the trust funds belonging to the pursuers fell to be added as forming part of the whole capital, and entitling them to a proportional share of the periodical profits upon the business of the company up to 1st January 1848, but from and after that date the amount of the capital of Black and Company was fixed by a written contract, by which, while the amount of the stock of the partnership was expressly limited to L.14,000, the other advances agreed to be made were to be of the nature of a loan by third parties, and therefore were necessarily excluded from the capital upon which the profits of the company fell to be estimated. It followed that the sum of L.14,000 must be taken as the capital of Black and Company since the commencement of this contract, in the proportionate division of the profits between them and the pursuers. To this view it was objected —"that the minutes must be taken as evidence of the capital held by each partner in the company upon the day when the docquet was made and signed, and the balance fitted." The pursuers admitted this, as a rule for adjustment of the interests of Black and Company inter se. But they objected to the application of any such rule in a question with them. They were entitled to have the relation of their funds employed in the business of the company constituted in 1848, maintained upon the footing upon which the misappropriation thereof was then assumed or continued by the new company, if it were for their advantage to require that this should be done; and no subsequent contract, or quasi contract to which they were not made parties, could affect their right in this respect. By assuming the trust-fund as part of the trading funds of their company, when they entered into the contract of 1848, Black and Company became bound to the pursuers, by a quasi contract of the most stringent character, in relation to the business of their partnership, as then constituted, which they were not entitled subsequently to alter prejudicially to the pursuers, without their knowledge or consent. And — as in regard to the obligation then incurred to the pursuers by their trustee, as one of the No. 233.

¹ M'Culloch's Dict. of Commerce, voce Capital; Brande's Dict. of Science, Literature, and Art, voce Capital; Trench on the Meaning of Words, p. 126; Stair, l. xvi. sects. 1, 2; Bell's Comm. vol. ii. pp. 612, 614, 619; Collyer on Partnership, p. 105.

 partners misapplying their money, and who therein committed a malversation in his office, with whose liabilities only they were at present dealing—that obligation is founded on quasi delict,—the principle here contended for becomes only the more clear and indisputable. July 16, 1857.
Cochrane v.
Black.

If the capital be the free fund after satisfaction of liabilities, it was beside the question at issue to enquire whether or not sums lent to the company may or may not be regarded as being equally the source of profit with the misapplied trust-funds belonging to the pursuers in the present case, but it was submitted that there was really no ground, according to the ordinary use of the term, to hold that the stock or capital of a company comprehends the fluctuating or floating funds which they may use. Thus, in the case of a bank commencing business, with a subscribed and paid-up capital or stock of L.100,000,—upon the credit of this stock deposits and loans are made to the bank to the amount of L.100,000 more. With these combined funds, amounting to L.200,000, the bank carries on its business, upon which its profits are realised. Surely the capital or stock of the bank would still be only the L.100,000 originally subscribed by the partners, and the monies held by them in deposit or loan would not be regarded as an addition to the capital of the bank, upon the plain ground that these were held only on condition of being restored to the depositors or lenders.

It was argued for the defenders;—The one essential matter to be determined was, what was it which earned the profits? No just approach could be made towards ascertaining how much any given one thousand pounds may have produced, unless due regard were had to every other thousand pounds which was united with it in the work of joint and common production. This rule had, however, been disregarded by the Accountant, who recognised, as capital or trading stock, those sums only which had been contributed from their own proper funds by the individual partners themselves, thus necessarily displacing from the category of capital the remainder of the stock traded on, in so far as derived from other sources, notwithstanding that each portion of stock, whencesoever drawn, must have contributed in producing the profits, rateably and proportionally with all the other portions, including the direct pecuniary contributions of the partners. If the whole profits earned were to be thus exclusively ascribed to the capital composed of the proper funds of the partners, the claim made by the pursuers for a share of profits would be at once rendered of no avail. For, according to the Accountant, the L.1000 of trust-funds formed no part of the capital, but was one of those liabilities of the company, which, being due to the public, though possessed and used by the company, must be thrown out of view before the true amount of the company's stock could be ascertained.

It was not disputed that in all questions concerning the measure of their rights and liabilities inter se the produce of their own direct contributions constituted the capital stock, and their interest in the latter was regulated by the amount of the sums severally contributed by the partners; but if the object be to ascertain what are the claims of a third party in the profits, in consequence of his funds having been improperly used in the company's trade? in such a case, his share being determinable by the amount of those funds relative to the capital of the company, that capital must be held to comprehend all monies—of whatsoever amount, and whencesoever derived—by which the profits have actually been earned.

Suppose the case of a house with no capital at all,—its trading funds consisting exclusively of borrowed money. In such a case the ratio of the accountant would give the whole profits to any party who might claim under such a title as that of the pursuer. A principle which led to such results was quite untenable. It was clear that, taking the balance of 31st

No. 233. December 1849 as an example, there was an aggregate in that year of L.66,276, 16s. 10d. truly constituting the trading capital or trading stock for the half-year. Each particular item denoted some species of tangible, available property—property actually embarked and employed in their trade. Each species of property contributed, according to its value, to earn the profits of the half-year; and no one item of it could have been withdrawn from the trade without a corresponding diminution of the profits earned. As shewing the effect of the accountant's ratio on the present enquiry, his mode of dealing with the L.10,000 borrowed and introduced into the trade under the contract of copartnery was referred to. In ascertaining the stock which earned the profits to be apportioned he had disallowed that sum solely because it was a liability owing to the public, yet it could not be said that it did not earn profit, pound for pound with the trust-funds: nay, by the contract of copartnery it had been placed in the hands of the company for the purpose of enabling the partners to earn profit, and under an obligation to have it in their hands for that purpose till the close of the partnership.¹

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—Of course it is unnecessary to say in this, or, indeed, in any case, that the question before the Court has received most attentive consideration. That question, important as it is in principle, has been argued on both sides in a manner much too artificial, and on grounds which have a great tendency to mislead, by introducing speculations as to what is the capital of a company in the abstract and primary use of the term. Perhaps some of the expressions in our preceding interlocutors may have in part occasioned this line of argument. And, indeed, in the argument at the bar, it was attempted at first to make out that the terms of these interlocutors had decided the question now raised in favour of the pursuers, and had stamped a certain meaning, in regard to the pursuer's claim, on the term capital or stock in trade. But we were all of opinion that any such construction of any terms used in the interlocutors was quite untenable, and that the question now at issue had not been in the contemplation of the Court or the parties at the prior stages of the discussion, in which only the general point was raised, whether the defenders were liable for the profits made by the use of the trust-funds, over and above paying five per cent interest. Perhaps the point is expressed in the best, because the most practical and general manner, in the commencement of the interlocutor of 13th July 1854, in which the claim is stated to be for "profits made on the sum left in the hands of the trading company of J. Black and Company by the defenders, as trustees of the late Colin Campbell, partners of the company, and employed in the trade of that company;" and again—"as the profits averred to have been made on the trust-funds by the employment of the same in the trade of the company, of which the trustees were partners."

The interlocutor of February 1, 1855, goes no further, and the use of the term stock or capital, or capital in trade, does not embarrass the question at all. Accordingly, no argument is now founded by the pursuers on the terms of these interlocutors. On the contrary, the interlocutor of remit to ascertain the profits made expressly finds the liability to be "for any profits made on the funds so employed, over and above the five per cent paid to the pursuers." And the remit is really to ascertain that matter of fact.

In ascertaining the extent of that liability,—in other words, the profits to be accounted for,—the point to be looked to, in my opinion, is the actual matter of fact—what profits were de facto made on the use of this L.1000 employed in the trade of the Company by the defenders, along with the other funds on which they traded? I cannot increase such profits beyond the actual fact by any speculations as to what is in one sense the capital in trade of the company in the event of dividing the interests of the several partners among themselves, or if they had been winding up

¹ 2 Docher v. Somes, 22d April 1834, M. and K. vol. ii. p. 653; Crawshaw v. Collin, Jac. and W. vol. i. p. 263; Russell, vol. ii. p. 346; Brown v. De Tater. Jac. C. Rep. p. 284.

No. 233.

July 16, 1857.
Cochrane v.
Black.

their affairs and paying off debts, and then dividing profits among themselves. Neither can I enlarge the profits actually made on this sum by any speculations as to the terms, capital, or stock in trade, as defined in commercial or legal works, in which these terms are all used in reference to the essentials of a company in the abstract or to the interests of partners. Any view must be unsound which, upon any theory whatever, would give to the pursuers more profits than this L.1000 could make and did de facto produce in the trade of the defenders as actually carried on. The accountant has adopted a view which rates the pursuers as entitled at once to be taken as upon a certain footing, and gives them practically a far greater share of profits than ever was or could be made on their L.1000;—exactly as if the L.1000 of trust funds so employed was to be placed on the footing of the proper stock of the partners inter se, and over and above 5 per cent. the pursuers would get about L.1300 of profit during the five years the same was used,—although it cannot be shewn that de facto any such sum of profit was or could be made on any L.1000 employed in the trade. The pursuers again contend that while the principle of the accountant in the abstract is correct, he has not consistently followed it out, and that his own views ought to have led to a different result in point of fact, and that on his principle they are entitled to a far greater interest in the concern in respect of the use of this L.1000 in the trade of the company, being about L.2130. And as between the accountant and the pursuers, I should be inclined to say, that if I could adopt the principle of the accountant, I should probably be constrained to hold that in its correct application the result contended for by the pursuers would follow. But the principle is, in my opinion, unsound, and, as often happens in the views taken of accounting by attempting to fix or apply general principles, the proper matter of fact to be ascertained is overlooked, and a result is arrived at by a theory in itself quite unjust and contrary to the actual facts of the case.

Let us see, in point of fact, what was the state of this Company as to its original input stock or shares of the partners, and as to its actual trade. They had but a small capital; but their trade seems to have been flourishing, and they were able to conduct it successfully. They borrowed money on which to trade, and on which, over and above the interest they had to pay, they were able to make profit. They bought largely goods on credit, with a view to resell them in a manufactured state, with profit over and above their original cost. And, in the course of their business, they seem to have raised a considerable sum on bills, both for purchases and otherwise. To what extent the amount of bills mentioned in the report were for raising money by accommodation, or were only short bills for the goods they bought, is not stated, and may materially affect the result in point of figures. The whole of these sums and goods were used in their trade and manufacture, in order to make profit over and above the sums due by them on these accounts. It is not disputed that they traded more or less on all these different funds, and so made profit; and that such profits exceeded the interest due on these loans, bills, and accounts, is also certain, otherwise the company would have been bankrupt, and could not have gone on with continued success.

The accountant says,—“The items, Nos. 2, 3, and 4 (in the table quoted supra, p. 1021), all form claims by the public against the company, and all debts due for the various articles of trade and manufacture needful in carrying on the business—such as cloth in its grey state, book debts owing for cloth sold in the manufactured and printed state, and drugs used in the art of dying and printing. The defenders seem to imagine, that notwithstanding these liabilities being justly due to the public for the necessary supplies to the company's business, that all of them are to be looked upon as a portion of the stock or capital of the company. If such a doctrine was established in conducting the affairs of a mercantile firm, then it might be gravely contended that the liabilities of a company on the verge of insolvency formed the stock of the house, and should be assumed, in questions such as the present, as the bona fide capital of the concern, when, in reality, they merely represented the debts due by them on bill, or open and outstanding accounts. The accountant cannot concur in the views advanced by the defenders under this head. He is of opinion that, in the general acceptation of the term, the capital of a company consists of the excess of the property of every description belonging to them, over the liabilities of all characters owing to the public; and it is by adopting this principle, and following up the

No. 233.
 —
 July 16, 1857.
 Cochrane v.
 Black.

contents of the docquets to the balance sheets of the partners themselves, that the capital account has been based in the accompanying report."

What is here said is perfectly true as to capital in the sense in which the accountant uses the term, and as to the class of cases to which his observations apply, viz., in the cases of winding-up and dividing the surplus stock in hand after paying debts, or in settling with retiring, or the representatives of deceased, partners. To ascertain the actual wealth of the company you must always set apart debts, and there can be no proper stock for division until the debts are paid. That is very plain. Again, if retiring partners are to be settled with, or the representatives of a deceased partner, they can claim nothing but their share of the stock which remains after paying all debts and deducting all losses at the time of the dissolution of the concern. But we are not in such a case at all. And this is the source of the error of the accountant. He takes the stock in trade to mean—not the whole capital embarked and used in trade by the company,—but the proper stock which, after settling all liabilities and paying off debts, would have belonged to each partner, if there had been a closing of the concern, and a division of the whole profits made to the shares of the proper company stock belonging to the partners respectively. And then he places the L.1000 of trust-funds on the same footing as the stock of the company, so as to give to the pursuers L.1629 as their share of the whole profits. Now, on what ground can this L.1000 be placed on a different footing in point of its character than any other L.1000 employed in the trade—say, the large sums of borrowed money? Take any sum of L.5000 which the company borrowed on bond or bill. They covenanted to pay on that L.5000 a certain rate of interest, but by using it thus they pay over and above five per cent., say L.100 of profit each year. That profit they keep to themselves, as they got the use of the money for five per cent. Well, then, they take the use of the trust-money—L.1000—at their own hand—to use in their trade, and in direct violation of their duties as trustees, and they are, over and above the five per cent, to repay back all the profits made by the use of that L.1000. But why is that L.1000 to be rated on a different footing from the L.5000 also borrowed, or how can the profits actually made on it be different from the rate and amount of profits made on each L.1000 of the above L.5000? It was used in trade: so was the L.5000. It was used, being borrowed money: so was the L.5000. It made profit: so did the L.5000. But being borrowed without consent, and contrary to their duty, they are to pay all the profit made on "the money so employed" in their trade. Well then, how is this L.1000, in ascertaining the profit actually made, to be on any different character or position than the L.5000?

On the notion of the available fund for division among partners, after deducting debts, this L.1000 ought to be deducted as much as the L.5000. But the accountant somehow gives it the character of the proper stock, after deduction of all other debts. The pursuers more consistently say, on that view, we are to be taken as partners, and to have a partner's share of profits; and they refer to English cases applicable to the rights of partners, or their representatives, whose money has been retained and used in trade. Apart from these cases, the accountant stops short, it would rather appear, in the right application of his own views. But laying aside that discussion between the pursuer and the accountant, the practical error in the accountant's view is the setting about a search for a meaning for the sense in which capital has been used, or is to be applied in this case. The real point for inquiry being truly what profit was made on this L.1000, as its share of the profits made on all the stock in trade on which the profits of the company were made.

If the stock in trade—that is, the aggregate sums embarked in the trade on which profits were made, was L.66,000, on which say L.6000 of profit was made in each year, then one L.1000 can only have a 66th part of that amount of profit. In stating that sum of L.66,000, I take it only as an illustration, but without the slightest intention of adopting any of the results contended for by the pursuers. No doubt a large proportion of the money on which the company traded was borrowed. So was this L.1000. But with it they made profit. So also the cloths they dyed were not yet paid for, nor the materials for their manufacture. They got both on credit. But they used both, and traded with them, and made profit over and above the sums due for each. If it shall be shewn that over and above the cost of such materials they did not make more than the price, then such part of the value of the stock on which they traded would be deducted as not having made profit, and the sum of profit effecting to the trust L.1000 would be increased beyond the 66th share. No. 233.

July 16, 1857.

Cochrane v.
Black.

But the point is, what difference is there between the value used in trade of money borrowed on regular loan and materials not paid for and this L.1000, except that being used without authority and contrary to duty, the proportion of profits made on that sum is to be paid to its owners over and above legal interest? I can find no difference, and by no theory of accounting can I be persuaded to overlook the actual fact as to the profits made on each L.1000 of the value embarked in the trade (that is the stock in trade), and upon a principle or theory give the pursuers more profit than this L.1000 earned, along with and in like manner as every other L.1000 similarly employed.

It must be at once seen that we have no concern with the principles either established or hinted at in the various English cases, in regard to the settlement with representatives of deceased partners whose funds have been continued without proper authority in the trade, and contributed to the profits made by the partners, and as to the position and interest of such representatives, as entitled to the full profits of partners, though not liable for losses. These cases have no application to the question now to be determined. I may mention that I have ascertained that the last case of Webster v. Wedderburne, which excited so much interest both in England and here, has been this winter settled for a few thousand pounds, and will not be again heard of.

As yet I think we have no materials on which we can say what was the amount of the sums and funds embarked in trade, and actually contributing to earn profits for the company. Take, for instance, the large amount of bills. If these were in whole or in part short bills, granted for the annual purchases of the company—being, in fact, postponed payments instead of payments in cash—it is plain that these bills cannot be said to represent money raised for the purpose of being used in the trade, and that in truth cloths or other materials for which they were granted have been already taken into account, and that the defenders had got credit twice over for what was actually used in their trade. If it shall turn out that their bills, or a portion of them, were proper accommodation bills (so far as the Blacks were concerned), of long dates, for twelve or six months, on which, with the aid of other names, they raised sums of money for the use of the trade, then, if profit was thereby made, such must be taken into account as much as money borrowed on a more regular footing. This and other matters must be ascertained before we can come to any definite conclusion, or fix the proportion of the stock in trade which the L.1000 of trust funds represents. The accountant probably has full materials for stating that result to us; but I think we must fix the principle on which this sum of L.1000 is to be stated, and then make a positive and special remit to him for the purpose the Court has in view.

In this practical result, I find, on communication, Lord Wood, who now agrees entirely with me in principle, and whose opinion I shall afterwards read, entirely concurs.

LORD MURRAY.—Agreeing as I do with your Lordship, I shall not enter into any detail. The only question is, what were the funds which realised the profits? It is a most important question whether the pursuers are to be regarded as placed in the position of partners or not. If they were, then they would have to share loss if any; but they are not liable to any such contingency. They are not made partners, but are parties whose money has been employed and made productive,—they are merely to receive the profits, if any, made by their funds. In this view I am clear that all borrowed money formed part of the capital producing profits. I am glad we are now all agreed on this general principle. There must, of course, be a farther remit, as the facts are not sufficiently brought out to enable us to pronounce a judgment in accordance with that principle.

LORD WOOD.—In the outset I may observe that I have no doubt that the question in regard to which the minutes of debate were ordered is entirely open, not being in any extent foreclosed by the prior interlocutors. The question itself is one of some importance and novelty. So far as I am aware, there is no authority in our law having any material bearing upon it, and the English cases which were cited have reference to the rights either of a retiring partner of a company, or of the

No. 233. representatives of a retiring partner whose funds have been retained by the company, and employed in its trade.

July 16, 1857.
Cochrane v.
Black.

At the conclusion of the argument which was addressed to us from the bar, I was inclined to adopt the view of the accountant in regard to the amount of capital of the firm of John Black and Company, on which any profit that might be realised ought to be apportioned. In this I was influenced by having an impression that the pursuers, in reference to the amount of trust funds embarked in the company's trade, might be looked upon as partners holding that amount of input stock: in which case, if profit had been to be divided either in certain fixed proportions or in a ratio effeiring to the amount of the sums contributed by each party, including the trust beneficiaries, it might have no effect upon the result, as regards the interest of the pursuers, whether the profit was held to have been made by the capital of the partners employed in the trade, with the addition of the trust-fund or by it, together with the amount of any money that might have been borrowed for the purposes of the trade, or upon the gross assets belonging to the firm. But I need not dwell upon this, because I am now satisfied that the pursuers cannot be looked upon in any other light than as being third parties, whose monies were wrongfully employed in the trade of Black and Company, but without thereby acquiring the character of proper partners to the amount of the fund so employed. And that being the case, I am further satisfied that, on the one hand, the Accountant's view that the capital of the company by which it is to be held that the profits, if any, were made, is to be limited to the funds of the partners employed in the business, cannot be supported; and that, on the other, the view contended for by the defenders cannot, to the whole extent to which it is pushed, be maintained; or at least cannot be maintained upon the footing of the information of which the Court is at present in possession.

Referring to the materials on which the Accountant proceeds in ascertaining for the half-year following the 31st December 1849, the capital by which the profits of that half-year are to be taken to have been produced, (and which half-year I specially advert to, for the reason to be immediately mentioned), it will be found that he fixes it at L.26,810, 14s. 8d. In doing so, the Accountant takes the capital at the amount which, in the docquet to the balance-sheet at 31st December 1849, is stated by the then two partners to be at that date the net free capital in the business, and to belong to them in equal proportions. This sum is the amount of the funds of the two partners then embarked in the trade; and it results from taking the whole assets on the debit side of the balance-sheet, and deducting therefrom all the debts of every description due by the company, the surplus of assets over debts thereby brought out amounting to L.26,810, 14s. 8d. And the Accountant having thus ascertained what he considers to be the amount of the capital apart from the trust-funds, it is upon that sum, with the addition of the trust-funds employed in the business, (and not upon the former exclusive of the latter, as the defenders erroneously allege in the minute of debate), as being together the producers of the profits made during the succeeding half-year, that these profits are apportioned, the pursuers receiving a share of them effeiring to the amount of the trust-fund. The same course is followed in regard to capital and profits at each half-yearly periodical balance, and I have only selected the half-year ending on the 31st December 1849 to which to apply the remarks I have to make, because it is to it that the defenders have referred in the argument they have submitted to the Court.

And here I may just remark in passing,—1st, That I think it unnecessary to advert particularly to the process resorted to by the Accountant in order to give the average amount for the full period of a year, of the stock of the partners; and 2d, That it appears to me that the pursuer's objection to the increase of the capital or stock of the partners, as said to be fixed by the contract of copartnery of 1848, by progressive additions to it, is altogether groundless.

Now, it will be observed that in fixing in the way the Accountant does the amount of the trading capital, there is inter alia excluded from forming a part of it all sums of money borrowed on loan and employed in the company's business; and by referring to the credit side of the balance-sheet, it will be seen that thereby there is not brought into account two sums of money borrowed from James Black and Hugh Robertson, amounting together to L.9994, 10s., as well as the trust-fund entered therein as amounting to L.998.

No. 233.

The rule of law, and the law of this case as found by judgment is, that the defenders are not entitled to make profit for their own benefit of the trust-money belonging to the pursuers, which was employed in the trade of Black and Company, but are bound to render such profit forthcoming to the pursuers. I lay aside for the present the pleas reserved by the interlocutor of 1st February 1855, whether the defenders are personally liable for the share of the profits so made effeiring to the interests in the concern of other partners, and also for the profits after the retirement of either of the defenders.

July 16, 1857.
Cochrane v.
Black.

Now, in applying the law, it appears to me that in the present inquiry above-mentioned, sums of borrowed money—and which confessedly were employed in the trade of the company for the half-year ending 31st December 1849—must be taken into account as forming part of the capital, producing what is reported to be the profit of that half-year. If, indeed, the question were only an inquiry as to the rights of partners in a division of profits or otherwise, which, it may be, would all fall to be regulated by their shares of the input stock, then that input stock might be called the capital of the company; but if, on the contrary, it is an inquiry as to the amount of capital or fund by which the profits have been made, then money borrowed by a company, and employed in its trade, forms, I apprehend, part of the trading capital by which the business is carried on, just as much as does the input stock of the partners; for the borrowed money, in proportion to its extent, equally with input stock, contributes to the production of any profits that may be earned. In that respect it differs substantially in nothing from the input stock of the partners, while the money of the pursuers improperly embarked in the business differs only in this from money regularly obtained on loan, that the surplus profits, after payment of the interest, belong not to the Company, as do those effeiring to the latter, but to the pursuers. I am therefore of opinion (and this apart altogether from any special ground on which the two sums referred to may be thought to stand, in respect of the provision in regard to them in the contract of 1848, as substantially declaring them to constitute part of the capital of the Company) that it is impossible to throw out of view borrowed money embarked in the business, as forming no part of that capital by which the profits, if any, are produced, or to which they are to be assigned in any proportional allocation of them. This I think is clear, and hence when the question is (as it is here), what is the profit made by the employment of the pursuers' money, and for which the defenders are to be bound to account, I apprehend that the amount of the capital by which the whole profit has been made in which the pursuers are to share, is not to be fixed upon the basis of the amount of the stock of the partners, together with the trust-money employed, forming that capital, but upon the basis of its being formed by the aggregate amount of these, together with the money obtained on loan. And, the capital being so fixed, then it is by allocating upon it proportionally the whole profit that the pursuers' just share effeiring to the amount of the trust-fund is to be found,—they being entitled to participate in the profits, instead of receiving only the ordinary interest on borrowed money. If a larger share of the profit were assigned to them, they would receive not only the profit made by their money, but a portion, more or less, of the profit made by the monies of others embarked in the trade.

So far, then, I think the view reported by the Accountant, in regard to the Company having capital at 31st December 1849, ought to be modified and corrected, by adding to the capital of L.26,820, 14s. 8d. the sum of L.9994, 16s., the amount of the borrowed money, making together L.36,815, 10s. 8d., and, with the farther addition of the trust-money, stated at L.998, making L.37,813, 10s. 8d., and the same ought to be done with each of the other half years in which there was borrowed money employed in the business. Or, turning to the debit side of the balance-sheet, containing a statement of the assets as at the 31st December 1849 (the total amount of which, or L.66,276, the defenders contend is to be taken as the trading capital), the assets there entered may, to the amount of the said sum of L.37,813, 10s. 8d., be held to be the trading capital for the succeeding half year; but this, not because the assets stated in a balance-sheet afford any correct test of the amount of the trading capital of a company, which I do not think they do, but because the assets to the foresaid amount represent a sum of the same amount on the credit side of the balance-sheet, consisting of the input stock, the

No. 233.

July 16, 1857.
Cochrane v.
Black.

borrowed money, and the trust-funds. The one is the equivalent of the other. From whichever of the three sources the assets to that amount may have been derived, they constitute an investment of money (or, which is the same thing, of property acquired by it) in the business of the Company, which has a character of permanency. If not diminished by losses, these assets must appear in the accounts of the Company during the period in question—either, it may be, in the same form, or, at all events, in one form or other; and, therefore, it may be said, that, to the extent of these assets, there was a capital embarked in the Company's trade, and that it was by a capital, to that amount, at least, that the profits were produced.

But I hesitate to go further, and hold, with the defenders, that the remaining balance of the assets on the debit side of the balance-sheet are to be also brought in computo as forming trading capital, so as thereby to make it amount to L.66,276, 16s. 10d. In specially referring to the amount of the assets, as stated in the balance-sheet at 31st December 1849, I only do so for illustration of the view which I entertain of the question at issue, the remarks I have to make being to be understood as equally applying to the other periodical balances of a similar description.

Now, to my mind, it is difficult to see how, in any case, the amount of the assets, as it may stand on the periodical balance-sheet at the end of a half year, can be taken as determining absolutely, and exclusive of all reference to the opposite side of the balance, the amount of the capital traded upon for the following six months, or any other period, and by which the profit (if any) for these six months is to be held to have been produced, or how, indeed, the gross amount of the assets at any particular date can be so taken. And when, in the present case, the opposite or credit side of the balance-sheet at the 31st December 1849 is turned to, it seems to me to be impossible that the gross amount of the assets can be taken unqualifiedly to be a just criterion of the amount of trading capital embarked in the business, by which the following half year's profits have been made. On examining that side of the balance-sheet, it will be found that there is an amount of bills payable by the Company, and of debts due to sundries, equal to the remainder of the valued amount of the gross assets, after deducting a sum equal to the input stock of the partners, the borrowed money, and the trust-funds; or, in other words, after deducting the foresaid sum of L.37,813, 10s. 8d.

Now, it may be asked, how does it appear that if a balance-sheet had been made up of a week or a fortnight's earlier date, it might not exhibit a less amount of assets by L.5000 or L.10000, or any other sum, than at the 31st December 1849, with a corresponding less amount of bills payable,—the assets and the bills having only come together into the company's accounts during the intervening period; or how does it appear that were a balance made a week or a fortnight after the 31st December 1849, there might not be found an equal diminution of both to a large amount, so that the gross assets (the trading capital contended for by the defenders) would by that time be reduced by some L.5000 or L.10,000? I do not say that it is so. I only put it as what might be the case, in order to test the soundness of the principle which the defenders would desire to have adopted, in fixing the amount of the trading capital of the company. To my mind it appears to be altogether fallacious, for I am not able to comprehend how ~~that~~ can be a sound principle to proceed upon, according to which there is, or may be included in, and made part of the trading capital for a half-year, property of so fluctuating a character, and which rests on no other foundation than bills payable by the company at, it may be, one or two months.

Then, again, referring to some of the particular items composing the assets. Take cash in banker's hands—bills receivable—and debts due by sundries, the sum of the last being L.7745, 18s.—can these be allowed to swell the amount of trading capital, when there are bills payable, and debts due to sundries, on the opposite side of the balance-sheet to a much larger amount? The two together may no doubt exhibit portions of the transactions of the company, and in that way may form proper entries in the balance-sheet, but so standing the accounts, I cannot think that the former can be taken as constituting any part of the company's trading capital. Accounts due to a company, while debts are due by it—surely do not form trading capital. They are only a set-off pro tanto against the debt, and will, it is to be presumed, be applied to its extinction as they are recovered.

In short, as regards the amount by which the gross assets exceed the amount of the input stock of the partners—the borrowed money—and trust-fund, against which there is on the opposite side of the balance-sheet an equal sum of bills payable, and debts due to sundries;—and there being nothing in the rest of the materials now before the Court to shew that as respects that portion of them, the assets have any character of permanency or continuity—it seems to me that they are to be viewed as being merely floating items of property, with corresponding floating amounts of debt or liabilities. They consist generally of goods or property which, instead of being paid in cash, are to be paid at short credits by bills payable at these deferred dates. While they may appear in the accounts at a particular date, they may only then have come to do so, and may again disappear almost immediately thereafter, together with an equivalent sum of debt, and this without—as is the case with the proper trading capital of the company—reappearing under some different character. Along with the entries on the credit side, they are made up of, and represent transactions arising in the ordinary course of the company's business varying from day to day, and although it may be that on these transactions, or some of them, profit may have arisen, still—the assets in question neither possessing, nor representing anything which possesses, any element of permanency or continued employment in the company's business (which as I think is essential to constitute what in any proper sense can be called trading capital), I hold that, in the present question, they cannot be taken into view as forming part of the capital or fund on which the profits for the half-year were made, and as standing on the same footing with the amount of the input stock, borrowed money, or trust funds employed and put to hazard in the company's business, in an allocation or distribution of the profits.

No. 233.

July 16, 1857.
Cochrane v.
Black.

I am therefore of opinion that the amount of the gross assets, as at the 31st December 1849, or at the date of any of the other half-yearly periodical balances, cannot be taken as fixing absolutely the amount of the trading capital by which the profits have been made, without any reference to the sources from which these assets have been derived. And, as at present advised, I am not prepared to hold that the trading capital of Black and Company for the half year preceding 31st December 1849 exceeded L.36,815, 10s. 8d, exclusive of the trust-funds.

But while, hoc statu, I see no ground for fixing the trading capital of Black and Company as at the 31st December 1849 at a larger amount than the above sum, I do not mean to say absolutely that the capital of the company must be limited to that amount. For it may be that money raised by bills, and put into and continued to be employed in the business, may legitimately form part of its trading capital as much as money borrowed on bond. And if it can be shewn by the defenders that to the amount of the assets which I have proposed to exclude in computing the trading capital, or any portion of them, there were funds raised by bills,—not in connection with particular transactions, and beginning and ending with them,—but kept up and traded upon by the company, so that these assets, with the bills, were not mere floating or fluctuating items in account, there might, so far as I at present perceive, be no ground for not enlarging to that extent the amount of capital to which the production of profit is to be assigned. I need hardly repeat that the same observation applies to the other half-year periodical balance.

LORD COWAN.—The question to be solved,—what profits were realised by the defenders on the L.1000 of trust-money employed by them in trade?—seems in itself sufficiently simple. And it would be so, in fact, had the trade been carried on exclusively with the L.1000. In that case, however large the value of the transactions carried on in the course of the year, the whole profits must, as I apprehend, have been accounted for to the beneficiaries.

The difficulty arises from the L.1000 having been employed by the defenders, along with their own funds and capital, in their trade as merchants. This necessitates the inquiry, what the amount of their trading capital was? On the result of that depends the share of the profits realised in the business which is to be ascribed to the L.1000. In itself essentially a question of fact,—it nevertheless involves important principles of accounting on which the pursuers and defenders are at direct variance, while the experienced mercantile accountant under the remit from the Court takes a different view from both.

By the interlocutor of 1st February 1855, the Court found, that as the trust-

No. 233. funds had been used by the defenders "as part of the stock or capital of the company of which they were partners, in its ordinary trade and business,"—they were
 ———
 July 16, 1857. liable to account for "any profits made in the funds so employed, over and above Cochrane v. the five per cent of interest paid to the pursuers;" and the remit to the account-
 Black. ant was to report the profit, if any, made "on the proportion of the capital in trade representing the trust-funds." In the principle of that interlocutor all of us concurred, on the grounds fully stated in the opinions given in the report of the case. But it is of primary importance towards the right application of the principle, that no misunderstanding should exist with regard to its intended effect and practical operation. My understanding certainly was, and is, that the trust-money is to be placed alongside, as it were, of the funds embarked by the defenders themselves, in their trade, and forming the capital or stock by which the business was carried on. If the defenders had, including the trust-money, L.10,000, L.20,000, or L.30,000, employed in the business, and the profits realised yielded to them ten per cent on that amount of capital,—then the pursuers are entitled to the same per centage, under deduction always of the five per cent already paid. I do not think it would satisfy the interlocutor, or be consistent with the principle recognised in it, were the accounting for profits allowed to proceed on any other footing.

Further, although it may not be of much use, in the practical solution of the case, to consider what the proper definition is of the term "capital" or "capital stock,"—I find it given in one of the latest authorities in words, which I adopt as expressing my view of the object to be aimed at:—"Capital stock is the sum of money or stock which a merchant, banker, or manufacturer employs in his business, either the original stock, or that stock augmented." The very term capital or stock implies fixedness in amount during the profits-year, or period to which the inquiry relates. The extent of the business done, or the gross value of the transactions engaged in from time to time, in the course of the year or period, can be no just criterion for ascertaining the amount of capital embarked in the concern by the trader. Out of that business, or of those transactions, the profits have been realised; but it is the fixed capital or stock,—the fund with which he has been trading,—that has been the means of realising them. And from this it follows, as a corollary, that the inquiry must have regard to the actual amount of funds employed during the period, whether half-yearly or yearly, in which that business or those transactions have been carried on from which the profits have been derived. It may be of diminished or of augmented amount, as compared with any former period. The fact to be ascertained, is the amount of funds embarked in their trade by the traders during each successive profits-year or period.

With these general observations in view, I will now explain the grounds of the opinion which I have formed.

1. And first as to the practical application of the principle of the findings in the interlocutor contended for by the pursuers.

From the period intervening between 1845 and 1848, the pursuers adopt the report of the Accountant; and their views so far will be for observation when the principle upon which the Accountant has proceeded is considered. The more material question argued by the pursuers relates to the effect of the written contract in 1848, under the terms of which the business of the defenders was carried on from that year downwards.

Their plea is, that as the written contract fixed the capital stock of the Company at L.14,000, it is to this sum, "as exhibiting accurately the capital of the Company, to which the amount of their trust-estate falls to be added so as to constitute the sum total upon which the profits are to be proportionately divided." And this plea is supported upon the ground that by assuming the trust-money as part of the trading funds of the Company when they entered into the contract, the defenders became bound "by a quasi contract of the most stringent character in relation to the business of their partnership as then constituted, which they were not entitled subsequently to alter prejudicially to the pursuers, without their knowledge or consent." This argument is essentially fallacious. It is so in every aspect in which it can be viewed. The defenders did not assume the trust-fund as part of the trading funds of their copartnership under this contract. They did not become bound to the pursuers in any manner or to any effect in relation to the business of their partnership as constituted by the contract. And it is idle to say that the defenders could not subsequently, at any time they chose, alter or modify their consensual arrangement of 1848 altogether irrespective of the pursuers. The contract of 1848, as embodying the agreement then entered into by the defenders for the conduct of their business, was under their exclusive control. At any time during the seven years of its endurance, its articles, whether in relation to the amount of capital stock or any other matter, were alterable at their pleasure; and it is to mistake the legal position of the pursuers to contend that their consent or knowledge was necessary to make the alterations effectual valent quantum in such questions as those involved in this accounting. To hold this would be to treat them as partners, which they are not. The trust-money in the hands of the defenders was year after year used in their trade and ordinary business along with their own funds; and hence arises the legal liability on their part to account for profits. But during each successive period in the conduct of the business to which the enquiry as to profits applies, there must necessarily be the corresponding enquiry as to the amount of capital invested in the business, the employment of which has been the means of their acquisition. Just as at any time the business might have been discontinued, so at any time the conditions on which it was carried on might be varied or altered by the partners.

No. 233.

July 16, 1857.
Cochrane v.
Black.

The contention of the pursuers would lead to very anomalous consequences. On the same ground they might with equal plausibility allege that, unless they had consented, the defenders, during the seven years of their contract, were not entitled to invest the trust-money otherwise than in their trade or business. At all events, if there is not to be an annual investigation as to capital employed and profits realised for each year of the period that the trust-money continued to be employed in the copartnership business, it could never be ascertained whether five per cent exceeded or fell short of their interest in the profits of that year. And if there is not to be an annual investigation—which the pursuers contend for equally with the defenders—it seems to me that the very enquiry contemplated by the interlocutor could not be carried out. Irrespective of the capital fixed by the contract of 1848, that enquiry must embrace not less the actual funds or capital embarked in the business by the defenders each year or period, than the profits, if any, realised each year or period. And for this very reason, indeed, it is that while the pursuers are entitled to have more than five per cent every year that profits were realised to a greater extent by the defenders, they are to have that per centage even where there was loss suffered by the defenders on the business of the year. Hence it is that the just rights of the parties, as much as the very terms of the interlocutor, require the investigation to be periodical both as to capital and as to profits.

2. The second question regards the practical application of the principle of the interlocutor contended for by the defenders; and this appears to me no less erroneous than the proposition maintained by the pursuers.

Their method is to take the entries on the debit side of the balance-sheet of each year or half-year, without regard to the entries on the credit side, and to hold the gross amount of that side of the balance-sheet as exhibiting the capital or stock employed by the defenders in their trade, on which, it is assumed, profits were realised during the ensuing year or half-year. The objections in principle to this method of proceeding, in the view I take of the case, are numerous.

The amount of the actual funds which the defenders had embarked in their trade at any one period is left entirely out of view, and yet it is in return for the funds or capital so invested that the profits are realised, and with reference to which alone it can be ascertained whether the concern is to the partners a profitable or a losing one.

The capital or stock of the company, in place of being of some fixed amount capable of being taken into consideration in estimating the rate of realised profits each year, is made dependent on the most fluctuating elements. For example, take the general balance struck on 31st December 1849 (and what I state as to it, is applicable to every other year or period), there may have been purchases of cloths, goods, or dye-stuffs, immediately preceding that date, and for which bills were granted, forming a portion of the amount of "bills payable," placed on the credit side of balance. Purchases of large extent may be in that situation, and the goods being added to stock, their value goes to swell the amount of the debit side of the

No. 233.
 July 16, 1857.
 Cochrane v.
 Black.

balance-sheet. And yet had those transactions been entered into not the week before, but the week after, the date of the balance, the capital or stock, with which the company were trading in the following year, would to that extent have been held of diminished amount. The same observation applies to those entries on the one side of balance, consisting of the debts due to the company by sundries, and of bills receivable, which must necessarily be of continually varying amount; and to the entries on the other side of balance, composed of debts due by the company, and of "bills payable" by them. Payments on account of these last, in December in place of January, by exhausting the cash account, or "bills receivable" requiring to be discounted to make such payments, or the debts due to the company requiring to be collected for that purpose, must have had the effect of varying and altering, to an undefined extent, the debtor side of the balance-sheet. Yet that is to furnish the elements for determining the fixed capital or stock on which the defenders were trading.

And I must farther observe, that I cannot at all understand how the unemployed money in the bank on the particular day of striking the balance, or the amount of bills then in the hands of the company, and, above all, the amount of debts due to them on open account, can be held capital stock for the ensuing year, and a source of the profits of the concern, when, if all realised and legitimately applied, they would be employed in the extinction of the debts due by the concern, or of the bills payable by them; and when, in truth, the profit on the transactions, represented in value by the amount in these several accounts, has already been realised in the preceding balance, and has been taken into view in striking the profits of the preceding year.

In general, I am of opinion that the view contended for by the defenders is fallacious in principle, by taking the extent of the business transactions in which the company have engaged in trading with their capital, as to afford any just estimate of that capital itself; because, from the very nature of the entries at the debit of balance at any particular date, they are not only fluctuating from day to day, but can at no time give any just approximation even to the amount of funds actually embarked in trade, and yielding profits of a greater or less amount if the trade be profitable, or exposed to loss, to a greater or less extent, if it be the reverse. Without enlarging farther, however, I shall merely add, that the reasoning of the Accountant in his report on this part of the case is, in principle, entirely satisfactory to my mind; and in discussing the practical method adopted by him in applying the findings in the interlocutor of Court under the remit, to which I now proceed, there will be an opportunity of developing the objectionable nature of the defenders' view, in its practical bearing and effect.

3. As regards one part of the accounting, there is a peculiarity which will require to be separately considered,—the effect, namely, of the two debts due by the company for advances made respectively to the extent of L.5000 each by the relatives of the two partners, in terms of the provision in the contract. Leaving these debts for the present aside, as standing in an exceptional position,—I have to express my approval of the principle acted on by the Accountant, and of the practical method he has adopted in getting at the true solution of the rights of parties, as opposed to and contrasted with the views contended for by the pursuers and by the defenders respectively.

What the Accountant has done is to ascertain the actual amount of funds, appearing from the balance-sheet and docquet thereto attached of each year, which the defenders had invested or embarked in their copartnery concern; and this amount he holds to have been the trading capital or stock on which the profits of the ensuing year were realised. It is not alleged that the defenders, in the preparation of the periodical balance-sheets, and in fixing by the docquet annexed thereto the amount from time to time of their trading capital, acted otherwise than in bona fide. The estimates made by them, and fixed by the periodic docquets, are to be taken as accurately made. Indeed, the burden of the defenders' argument lies in this, that the docquetted balances merely shew what the partners would have realised had the concern been wound up as at their dates. For that purpose the estimates are admitted to have been well and accurately made; in other words, they afford good evidence of the actual amount of the funds truly invested in the business and embarked by them in the concern at each successive period. And is not this precisely

No. 233.

July 16, 1857.
Cochrane v.
Black.

what is wanted for the right adjustment of this accounting? The capital sunk by the partners with the view of making profit is thereby fixed upon legitimate data. The condition of fixedness is thus satisfied. That fixed amount again is brought out to be the trading capital of each period or year to which the profits annually ascertained have relation. And further, it meets what seems to me all essential, that just apportionment of the profits between the defenders and the beneficiaries in the trust money, which no other principle or mode can possibly do. Each party will draw their due proportion of the annual profits according to the amount of funds respectively invested of theirs in the business, and exposed to the risks and perils of the Company's trade. Taking the actual trading funds of the partners—whether their own or raised by loans I care not—in any one year at L.19,000, and the trust money at L.1000, then the former will have assigned to them 19-20ths of the profits, and the trust beneficiaries will receive 1-20th in so far as it exceeds 5 per cent. on the trust money. But this equal and just proportion,—any departure from which is, in my view of it, inconsistent with the principle on which the defenders' liability to account rests,—cannot but be disturbed and interfered with by the mode of ascertaining the capital contended for by the defenders. According to their views, the greater the extent to which the company with its capital of L.20,000 pushed the business, by just so much less became the proportion of the profits effeiring to the trust money. For if the debtor side of the balance-sheet amounted to L.40,000, the liabilities on the other side of the sheet not being deducted, then 1-40th, and not 1-20th of the profits would be the share falling to the trust beneficiaries, while the remaining 39-40ths would be taken by the partners, although they had invested in the business only L.19,000. The actual result contended for is in reality more inequitable than in the supposed case. For, taking the trust money at L.1000, and the actual funds invested by the defenders in the concern during the year from 1849-50 at the average stated by the Accountant of L.23,000, the amount at the debit of balance in December 1849 is L.66,000. Thus the practical result is, that in place of an equal share being given to the trust beneficiaries and the defenders proportional to the actual funds belonging to them respectively, invested and imperilled in the business, the beneficiaries are to have only 1-66th part of the profits of the year, while the partners are to take the remaining 65-66ths. This is a very effective method, no doubt, of bringing down the share of profits effeiring to the trust money, and in some years possibly to make them less than the 5 per cent. of interest; but I cannot hold it consistent with the principles that ought to rule the accounting. The result may be, that while the pursuers are found entitled to no more than the 5 per cent. they have already received, the defenders will draw upon the actual amount of funds embarked by them in the business a very high per centage under the name of profits.

To illustrate this, let the business carried on have been a banking concern, the partners having advanced as their capital L.9,000, which, with the L.1000 of trust-money, makes L.10,000 at the command of the company for their business. This, in its simplest aspect, consists in the receiving of money on deposit, and advancing money on bills or otherwise, at a higher rate of interest, the difference constituting their profit. Take their deposits at L.40,000. This, with their capital, gives an extent of business throughout the year of L.50,000. If three per cent be paid to the depositors, while five per cent is the rate obtained on their discounts and advances, the annual profit yielded by the concern will be two per cent, on L.50,000 or L.1000. Hence on the capital of L.10,000, composed of the L.9000 embarked in the concern by the partners, and the L.1000 of trust-money, there is realised a per centage of ten per cent. This is the proportion of profits, to which, as it seems to me, the beneficiaries are entitled. But, in the defenders' view, the proportion of profits to be drawn by the beneficiaries is not one-tenth, but one-fiftieth of the whole profits, or two per cent. Consequently, while the partners in the concern, on their capital of L.9000, are drawing ten per cent, the trust-beneficiaries, whose funds have been imperilled in the business, are to be entitled to nothing out of the profits, but must be content with five per cent interest.

What is true as to a banker's business is no less true as regards any other trading concern. The principle is the same, whether it be goods or money—that is the subject-matter of the business; but it may make the result to which it would lead

No. 233.
 —
 July 16, 1857.
 Cochrane v.
 Black.

more striking, to vary the figures in the preceding illustration, and to suppose that while the trust-money embarked in the business amounted to L.9000, the banker or trader's own funds amounted only to L.1000. The inequality in the apportionment of profits that would follow may easily be calculated.

The truth is, that in no case can the extent of the transactions be taken as affording a just criterion of the extent of stock or capital on which the trading has been carried on. The most unjust results would be the consequence of adopting that principle. In my apprehension, its application would in many cases be tantamount to a refusal to give effect to the principle on which our former interlocutor is founded.

The defenders object to the accountant's principle, that according to him the L.1000 of trust-funds forms no part of the capital stock of the company; and a great deal of observation is made on this assumption. This seems to me to proceed upon misapprehension. No doubt the accountant brings out, and as I think legitimately, the amount of funds or capital belonging to the partners which they had each year embarked in trade; but, in striking the profits, the trust-funds, in place of being left in the entries upon the two sides of the balance-sheet neutralising each other, are added to the funds belonging to the partners, and the profits are then divided upon that basis. The appendices annexed to the report clearly establish this. Accordingly, the accountant, at page 6 of his report, states expressly that while he adopted the sums stated in the docquets as the periodical capital of the company, "the calculations which follow are founded on the principle of adding the sums of capital as stated in these docquets to the trust-funds and ascertained profits of the pursuers, thus forming a basis for the calculations referred to in the appendices."

While, however, in general I consider the Accountant to have justly appreciated the practical principles that ought to be applied to the case, it seems to me that, in one respect, there is room for holding his report and relative calculations erroneous. I am not satisfied that the point was brought so clearly under his deliberate consideration as it ought to have been, and as I incline to think it should still be. The extreme views contended for by the defenders seem alone to have been considered specially by the Accountant. At all events, we have no special report on the matter to which I now advert, and on which, as at present advised, I think the report and relative calculations require correction.

A trading company may raise part of the fixed capital or funds on which the business is carried on by means of permanent loans from bankers or others. It is even conceivable that a very large proportion of the trading capital may be so obtained. For example, trading companies may, and very frequently do, obtain advances from bankers by means of cash accounts. A sum of L.5000 or L.10,000 thus raised placed at the command of a company for their business may fairly be held as part of their trading capital. And, certainly, when by their contract of copartnership such a mode of raising money to be employed in the business is expressly recognised, it seems to me that funds thus obtained and actually employed in trade with the rest of their capital cannot but be held to stand in the same predicament. Together they constitute the fixed or permanent capital or trading funds of the concern on which their profit is realised. On the same principle, permanent loans obtained for the very purpose of enlarging the capital and increasing the business are to be taken into account. It is on that business so carried on — on that trading capital or stock, consisting—first, of the funds belonging to the partners themselves sunk in the concern; and, second, of the borrowed funds raised for the purpose of increasing their own capital — that the profits of the year are made. Hence, in any question such as is here raised, I think it is the amount flowing from both sources that is to be taken into calculation along with the amount of trust-money traded on in fixing the proportion of profits falling respectively to the partners and to the beneficiaries.

Now, it is satisfactorily established by the terms of the contract of copartnership entered into on 1st July 1848, that, in addition to the funds advanced by the partnership respectively, their relatives, James Black and Hugh Robertson, agreed "each to lend to the said company the sum of L.5000 sterling during the subsistence of the said contract," on payment of interest as therein stipulated, and with power to the company to repay the loans, "but it being understood that the said

No. 233.

July 16, 1857.
Cochrane v.
Black.

James Black and Hugh Robertson, and their heirs and assignees, shall not be entitled to repayment of the principal sums so advanced by them until the expiry of the contract or the dissolution thereof." This seems to me in substance and effect an express stipulation that the advances under these loans, so long as not paid off, were intended to constitute, as they did de facto constitute pro tanto, the trading stock of the company. The result was precisely the same as regards the increase of the funds embarked by the partners in their trade, as if the loan had been obtained by the partners individually from their respective relatives, and added to the sums which they had individually embarked in the concern as trading capital. The advances thus obtained partake of all the qualities which the funds periodically invested in the concern by the partners possessed to constitute them trading capital or stock, on which profits have been realised. There may be some flaw in the reasoning at which I arrive at that conclusion. If so, I have failed to perceive it. It is possible that were the matter brought specifically under the view of the accountant, considerations might be suggested, did he remain of the adverse opinion, to warrant an opposite result. My present conviction, however, is, that to that extent the defenders have succeeded in shewing that the report is objectionable, and that the L.10,000 ought to be taken into view along with the amount of capital stated in the periodic docquets from 1st January 1848 downwards, in the ascertainment and apportionment of the profits to which the pursuers are entitled.

Taking as the model balance-sheet, that for the year 1849-50, as before, and having regard to the states in the appendices to the report, the result at which I arrive is, that there must be added to the average capital of L.23,000, brought out as the trading funds of that year belonging to the defenders, the two debts of L.5000 each; and that the proportion of profits must be adjusted on the principle adopted by the accountant, subject to that alteration. The calculations as to the other profits' years or periods will require to be readjusted on the same basis. And, I may add, that it must be for inquiry whether prior to the date of the contract in January 1848, and from 1845 downwards, there were not sums of money borrowed by the company, and used by them as a permanent addition to their trading funds, which ought for these years or periods to be treated as standing on the same footing with the two loans in question. If so, the principle applicable to the latter will equally apply to the former.

In the argument of the defenders it is insinuated rather than stated, that, in the amount of "bills payable," and of "debts due by the company," set forth on the debit side of each half-year's balance-sheet—in that already mentioned of 1849-50—at L.27,902, 14s. 6d., and L.560, 11s. 8d. respectively, there are sums standing in the same situation as the two permanent loans to which I have referred. This may be the case; but it seems to me that the particular sums or debts of that nature ought to have been specifically mentioned. My understanding of the items composing those two entries in the balance-sheet is, that they consist merely of current obligations contracted in course of carrying on the business of the half-year or year, and outstanding at the date of each periodic balance. It is on this footing that the accountant has dealt with them; and in that view of their nature has rightly dealt with them as deductions requiring to be made from the assets, in order to bring out the just amount of the trading capital or funds of the company. No doubt it may be that among the bills payable there are obligations in the shape of accommodation bills, or bills for loans of money, having the effect of giving the company, for a longer or shorter period, the command of funds to be used in their trade as part of their permanent trading capital. Under any remit which your Lordships may make to the accountant, this will be ascertained. All I shall say at present is, that should any such to me unexpected state of the facts emerge, I do not hold myself, in the opinion which I have expressed, precluded from entertaining the question whether funds so raised may not fall under the same principle as the permanent loans of L.10,000 to which I have referred.

I have only to say farther, and in conclusion, that I have attentively considered the English cases to which reference has been made in the argument; and that in so far as the general reasoning on which they proceed can be held applicable to such a case as the present, that reasoning is not inimical, but on the contrary tends to support those views which I think ought to receive the sanction of the Court.

No. 233.

July 17, 1867.
Macfarlane v.
 Lewis.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Find that in ascertaining the amount of profits made on the trust funds belonging to the pursuers employed by the defenders in their trade, no fixed sum, whether stated in the docquets to the balance-sheets or otherwise, is to be taken as the amount of the proper capital or stock of the company of J. Black and Company, in reference to which the trust money as it may stand at the commencement of any yearly or half-yearly period is to be rated, and to share in profits with the partners on that sum, as a proportion of such divisible capital: And find, that in ascertaining at any particular date the amount of the capital or fund by which, together with the trust monies, the profits (if any) for the succeeding period of a year or half-year is to be held to have been made, there is to be taken into account not only the amount of what may be found to be the proper input stock or funds of the partners employed in the trade of the company, but all other funds or monies, whether consisting of money regularly borrowed on loan or obtained in any other way in order to be employed in the business, and which have accordingly been invested and employed in it, and on which the trade has truly been carried on for the period in question: Find that the stock or funds employed in the trade, including the trust money, and by which the profit is to be held to have been made as aforesaid being ascertained, the share of the profit to be assigned to the pursuers is to be in the proportion which the amount of the trust money bears to the whole amount of the said stock or fund; and with these findings, before farther answer, remit to to ascertain in each year, without reference to any balance made up by the partners between themselves yearly or half-yearly, what was the total amount of the sums and funds employed in carrying on the trade of the company by means of which profits were made, what was the amount of profits thereby made in each year or half-year, so as to show at once in a short table for each year or half-year, the stock or funds employed in the trade as aforesaid, and the proportion thereto of the trust funds: The Accountant to state the particulars of which the said stock or fund is made up, and to explain the view or principle on which he has proceeded in including the same as forming part of the stock or trading capital by which the profit has been made, and also to explain, in so far as he thinks it necessary for the information of the Court, the grounds on which he has excluded any other items which the parties may have considered ought to have been added thereto: The Accountant to apply to the Court for any farther instructions, if, after considering the opinions of the Judges, he should feel any difficulty in acting on this remit, with power to him to call for all explanations and documents he may require."

Some time after the above interlocutor was pronounced, the whole question of accounting between the parties became the subject of a judicial reference.

WILLIAM MACKENZIE, W.S.—W. A. G

No. 234.

JOHN, WILLIAM, AND JAMES MACFARLANE

A. R. Clk

JOHN LEWIS, Defender.

Process—Issues—Property—River.—An allegation that the defender had altered the c perty, which resulted in injury to the pursuers' adjoining lands;—Held to contain issueable matter. No. 234.

Issue adjusted to try the question.

July 17, 1857.

Macfarlane v.

Lewis.

1st Division.

Lord Neaves.

C.

THIS action was brought by the Macfarlanes against Lewis, contending for L.120 as the damage done to two fields belonging to the pursuers, and adjoining the defender's lands, and to the drains in these fields, by and through the operations of the defender on a stream called Boardsburn. The allegations were, that the defender had altered the course of the stream, which was entirely within his own lands, so as to make it run close along the pursuer's march dyke for about 300 yards; "that the course of the stream, as existing from time immemorial previous to the operations, was in no way injurious to the pursuer's fields," but "that part of the new channel or cut at the upper end thereof is higher than some parts of the pursuer's said fields, and the water therein, in time of floods, percolates through the banks to the pursuers' fields, and is otherwise thrown upon them so as seriously to damage the land." The pursuers also alleged that the defender had altered the course of an affluent or tributary of the burn, "which originally flowed into the burn at the most northerly part of its channel upon the defender's lands, being the part farthest from the pursuers' fields. The alteration consisted in making the affluent join the new channel at a right angle immediately opposite to the pursuers' fields, and within almost three feet of them." The result, it was alleged, was to cause "a deposit of stones, gravel, sand, and other debris at the mouth of the drains on the pursuers' lands, so that the drains were choked up, causing, in time of floods, the fields to be overflowed, to the loss and injury of the pursuers;" and the operations were said to have been made by the defender, or others for whom he was responsible, and by his authority, and were wrongful and illegal.

The defender pleaded;—That there was no issueable matter in the record, in respect this was not a question between superior and inferior heritors, nor of conterminous proprietors. The operation was in itself lawful, and there was no averment that it was done in a careless or negligent manner. The defender was entitled to make use of his own property in the manner most beneficial to himself.¹

The pursuers pleaded;—That the defender was bound so to conduct his operations as not to injure the adjoining lands. Injury was the necessary consequence of the act performed, which made it illegal at common law. It was enough for the pursuers to allege that, in consequence of these operations, injury had been done to them: It might be for the judge at the trial to say whether they had made out a case sufficient for damages.²

The Court, on 1st July, appointed the pursuers to lodge issues. They proposed the following:—"Whether, by certain operations executed by the defender in the course of the years 1838 and 1839, or about that time, he altered the natural course or channel," &c. "and whether, in consequence thereof, the lands of the pursuers" "have been, on one or more occasions," "wrongfully by the defenders flooded with water," &c.

The defender objected that the word "wrongously" was here applied to the consequence of his operations. The whole case was that he had performed operations which he had no right to perform, as they brought injury to the pursuer;—they must bring up their case to that point by their issue.

LORD PRESIDENT.—What the record characterises as wrongful are the operations which led to the deposit of stones. The wrong alleged is performing the opera-

¹ Ersk., B. 2, T. 1, sect. 2; Samuel v. Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Company, 12th December 1850, ante, vol. xiii. p. 312.

² Bell's Pr. sect. 1108; Menzies v. Breadalbane, 4th July 1828, 3 W. & S. 235 (op. of Lord Chancellor); Sir Michael Shaw Stewart, Hume, 522, and 15 S. 868.

- No. 234. tions in such a way as to cause a deposit,—that is, that the defender wrongfully did so and so, whereby the result complained of followed.
- July 17, 1857.
Keith's Trustees v. Keith and Others.

The issue, as adjusted, stood as follows:—"Whether, by certain operations executed by the defender in the course of the years 1838 and 1839, or about that time, he wrongfully altered the natural course or channel of a burn or stream called Broadburn, situated within his property of Northfield and Blushquarter, and adjoining or near to the march between said property and the pursuers' lands of Broadleys, and of a tributary or affluent thereto, so as to cause a deposit of stones, gravel, and sand, or other material, to be formed by the stream at or near the lower end of the new course or channel below or near to the main drain of the pursuers' lands adjoining, whereby the lands of the pursuers, to the extent of two acres or thereby, adjoining or near to the said march, were on one or more occasions, in January and February 1852, or about that time, flooded with water, and the drains thereon choked up, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuers?"

Damages laid at L.120.

ALEX. J. NAPIER, W.S.—HUGH J. ROLLO, W.S.—Agents.

- No. 235. HENRY MERRICK HOARE AND OTHERS (Lord Keith's Trustees), Nominal Raisers.—G. G. Bell—Horn.
DOWAGER VISCOUNTESS KEITH AND OTHERS, Real Raisers.—Moir—Monro.
BARONESS KEITH AND NAIRNE (Countess Flahault) AND HUSBAND, Claimants.—Sol.-Gen. Maitland—N. C. Campbell.
HON. MRS VILLIERS AND HUSBAND, Claimants.—D. F. Inglis—Moir—Monro.

Parent and Child—Legitim—Clause—Succession—Election—Collation—Trustee.—An antenuptial contract of marriage contained provisions for the children of the marriage, after which this clause:—"Which portions above mentioned provided to the children of this marriage, in the respective events before specified, are and shall be in full satisfaction to them of all bairns' part of gear, legitim, executry," &c.;—Held (altering judgment of Lord Ardmillan), on a review of the whole deed, that the term "children of the marriage" included the heir, and barred all claim of legitim.

Terms of a marriage-contract in English form between parents, which held (aff. judgment of Lord Ardmillan) not to import a discharge of legitim by the children of the marriage, but held that a daughter, claiming legitim, was bound to elect between legitim and provisions under a subsequent universal settlement;—and that the fact that her rights under the universal settlement were contingent, did not entitle her to defer her election; and held (aff. judgment of Lord Ardmillan), that trustees under a universal settlement could not compel a party entitled to legitim to collate marriage-contract provisions, when collation was not demanded inter vivos.

Husband and Wife—Jus relictæ—Marriage-contract—Clause—Election.—An antenuptial contract of marriage in the English form between a Scotchman and an Englishwoman, both resident in England, provided an annuity to the wife, which she accepted "in lieu and full bar and satisfaction of the dower or thirds, which, at the common law or by custom, she can or otherwise might claim from the estates of" her husband; and also "in full bar and satisfaction of the terce" to which she is or otherwise might be entitled by the law of Scotland;—Held (altering judgment of Lord Ardmillan), (1) that the widow was not barred from her claim of jus relictæ, but (2) (aff. judgment of Lord Ardmillan) that she was bound to elect between her legal rights and testamentary provisions created under a universal settlement left by her husband; and (3) that in the event of her electing to take the jus relictæ, it was not to be reduced in amount by imputing thereto any sums provided in the contract of marriage, but that these, in so far as not already satisfied, must form a deduction from the free moveable estate.

Statutes 39 & 40 Geo. III. cap. 98 (Thellusson Act)—11 & 12 Vict. cap. 36, sec. 41—Intestate—Succession.—Held (altering judgment of Lord Ardmillan), that under a trust-settlement, the truster having died in 1823, directions for accumulating the rents of heritable property in Scotland were not affected by the Thellusson Act or the 11 & 12 Vict. cap. 36, but (aff. judgment of Lord Ardmillan) that in so far as the deed directed accumulations of profits of heritable property in England, and moveables wherever situated, the Thellusson Act applied, and that accumulations having been made contrary to that Act, they belonged equally to the daughters by two marriages as intestate succession.

No. 235.

—

July 17, 1857.
Keith's Trustees v. Keith and Others.

Homologation.—Dealings with trustees acting under a universal settlement, which held (aff. judgment of Lord Ardmillan), not to bar the parties from insisting after many years on their legal claims.

ON 9th April 1787, the Hon. George Keith Elphinstone—afterwards Viscount Keith—entered into an antenuptial contract of marriage with Miss Jean Mercer, which contract, after providing for an annuity of L.500 to Mrs Elphinstone, and containing an obligation to infest her in lands to be afterwards purchased by Mr Elphinstone, in manner therein specified, contained the following provisions:—“And in the meantime, until such purchase or purchases are made, the said George Keith Elphinstone binds and obliges himself and his foresaids to pay and deliver to” various parties therein named as trustees, for the purposes thereafter mentioned, “the sum of L.10,000 sterling, and that at and against the term of Martinmas next to come,” “which sum is to be lent out upon bond or other sufficient security, heritable or moveable, and the securities thereof to be taken payable for behoof of the said George Keith Elphinstone and Jean Mercer, in conjunct fee and liferent, for the said Jean Mercer her liferent use allenary, for security and payment to her of said annuity, and afterwards for security and payment, pro tanto, of the provisions after-mentioned to the children of this marriage; or otherways, the said George Keith Elphinstone binds and obliges himself and his foresaids, at and betwixt the said term of Martinmas next, to assign and convey to the said trustees such bonds or other securities as the said trustees shall be satisfied with,—the principal sums in which shall amount to the said sum of L.10,000 sterling, and that in trust and in the terms foresaid, for security and payment of the said annuity to the said Miss Jean Mercer, and of the provisions after-mentioned to the children of this marriage.”

1st Division.
Ld. Ardmillan.
C.

Farther provision was then made for the event—which did not happen—of Mrs Elphinstone surviving her husband; and after a clause, in which Mrs Elphinstone accepted the provisions as in full of all terce of lands and jus relictæ, and of all claims by her next of kin, there followed this clause:—“And farther, in contemplation of the said marriage, the said George Keith Elphinstone hereby binds and obliges himself and his foresaids, against the term of Whitsunday 1788, to provide and secure upon land or other sufficient security, the sum of L.16,000 sterling, in which sum is comprehended and included the foresaid sum of L.10,000, . . . and to take the rights and securities thereof, at the sight of, and with the consent of the said trustees, and in favours of himself and the sons to be procreated of this present marriage, one after another, and to the heirs whatsoever of their bodies; whom failing, to the sons to be procreated of the body of the said George Keith Elphinstone of any subsequent marriage, one after another, and to the heirs whatsoever of their bodies; whom failing, to the daughters of this marriage, and the heirs whatsoever of their bodies, the eldest heir-female ways succeeding without division, and excluding heirs-portioners; whom failing, to the said George Keith Elphinstone, and his heirs or assignees whatsoever; Providing and declaring always, as it is hereby expressly provided and declared, that the foresaid sum of L.16,000 sterling is provided to the heirs of this marriage in manner foresaid, not only with and under the burden of the foresaid provisions, to and in favours of the said Jean Mercer,

No. 235.
 —
 July 17, 1857.
 Keith's Trustees v. Keith
 and Others.

but also under the burden of suitable portions and provisions to the children of this marriage or their descendants, other than the heir of the marriage succeeding as aforesaid, which provisions are to be proportioned by the said George Keith Elphinstone himself: But in case he shall fail or neglect to make such provisions, then and in that case it is hereby declared, that in case of one child, other than the heir of the marriage succeeding as aforesaid, the said sum of L.16,000 sterling, or lands to be purchased therewith, is hereby burdened with L.2000 sterling to such child: In case of two children other than the heir, the same is hereby burdened with L.4000 sterling, to the said two children equally among them; and in case of three or more children, other than the heir, the said sum or lands to be purchased therewith, is hereby burdened with the sum of L.6000 sterling, to the said three or more children equally amongst them; which sums the said George Keith Elphinstone binds and obliges himself and his foresaids, to pay to the said children, other than the heir of the marriage, in the proportions above mentioned, and that at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after his decease, &c.: And farther, it is hereby expressly provided and declared, that in case the daughters of this marriage, or their descendants, shall happen to be excluded from the succession to the foresaid provisions, by an heir-male to be procreated of the body of the said George Keith Elphinstone of any subsequent marriage, then and in that case the said George Keith Elphinstone shall be bound and obliged to content and pay to the daughters of this marriage, and to their descendants who shall be so excluded, the respective sums after mentioned, viz.:—If one daughter the sum of L.5000 sterling, if two daughters the sum of L.8000 sterling, and if three or more daughters the sum of L.10,000 sterling, and that by such proportions and divisions as the said George Keith Elphinstone shall think fit to appoint, by a writing under his hand at any time of his life, in case of two or more daughters; and failing such division, the said sums in the respective events foresaid, shall fall and divide equally among them; and which provisions, in the events above mentioned, are and shall be payable to the said daughter or daughters at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after the decease of the said George Keith Elphinstone, &c.; and which portions above mentioned provided to the children of this marriage in the respective events before specified, are and shall be in full satisfaction to them of all heirs' part of gear, legitim, executry, and everything else they can ask or claim, by and through the decease of the said George Keith Elphinstone, their father, any manner of way, except further what he shall think fit to provide to them of his own good will: And it is hereby agreed on by both parties that all execution needful shall pass upon this contract at the instance of the "trustees, "for implement of the provisions above mentioned in favour of the said Jean Mercer, and the children to be procreated of this marriage."

This marriage was dissolved by the death of the wife, leaving one child of the marriage—the claimant, Baroness Keith, Countess Flahault.

In 1808, Viscount Keith entered into a second marriage with Hester Maria Thrale, on which occasion an antenuptial contract under the English form of an indenture was entered into betwixt them. By that deed, each of the spouses conveyed to trustees a sum of L.25,500 for behoof of the spouses and the survivor in liferent, and to the child or children of the marriage in fee; and it was declared that "if there shall be but one child of the said George Lord Keith, by the said Hester Maria Thrale, who, being a son, shall attain the age of twenty-one years, or being a daughter shall marry with such consent as aforesaid, then the whole of the said trust-money, stocks, funds, and securities shall be in trust for that one child, his or her executors, administrators, and assigns." The deed also contained farther provisions for Hester Maria Thrale, inter alia, an annuity of L.1500 "for or in the nature of her jointure and in bar of her dower ;” and it was farther provided that this jointure “is to be, and she, the said Hester Maria Thrale, doth hereby accept the same for her jointure, and in lieu and in full bar and satisfaction of the dower or thirds which at the common law, or by custom, she, the said Hester Maria Thrale, can or otherwise might claim from the estates of the said George Lord Keith; and also in full bar and satisfaction of the terce to which she is, or otherwise might be entitled, by the law of Scotland.”

No. 235.
July 17, 1857.
Keith's Trustees v. Keith and Others.

Viscount Keith died in March 1823 without leaving any heir male of his body. He was survived by his eldest daughter, the Countess Flahault, and by his widow, the Dowager Countess Keith and by his only child by her, the claimant Mrs Villiers—a widow without children. The Countess Flahault never had a son, but had three daughters.

It was averred in this action by Mrs Villiers that Lord Keith was domiciled in Scotland at the time of his second marriage, and at the time of his death. For Lord Keith's trustees and the Countess Flahault the averment of domicile was not admitted.

Lord Keith left a trust disposition and settlement executed in the Scottish form on 9th July 1817, and a last will in the English form bearing the same date.

By this trust disposition and settlement he conveyed to the trustees the Lordship and barony of Kincardine and Tulliallan, and all other lands and heritable property in Scotland which he might succeed to, or acquire and die possessed of, excepting certain lands and securities which were to be sold, and which were dealt with in subsequent clauses of the deed. The truster directed, that the lands thus particularly and generally conveyed, should be entailed in manner thereafter mentioned. He directed that his whole other heritable and moveable property, and the lands and securities therein appointed to be sold, should be converted into money, and the proceeds, after payment of debts, legacies, and expenses, be laid out in the purchase of lands in Scotland situated as near to, and as convenient as might be to one or other of the properties which he conveyed by the trust-deed; and that the lands to be purchased should be entailed in the same way as these properties. The trust-deed then set forth, that it was the truster's intention to execute of even date therewith a last will and testament, for the purpose of conveying to the trustees his whole real and heritable estates in England, and his moveable property wherever situated, in order that the free residue might also be laid out in the purchase of land in Scotland to be entailed. The truster then conveyed to the trustees his lands and securities in Scotland, which were excepted from the principal dispositive conveyance as being appointed to be sold.

The first purpose of the trust-deed regulated the deed of entail which Lord Keith directed his trustees to execute. It proceeded on the consideration that his Lordship had no heir male of his body, and that for reasons which seemed to him fit, he in all events excluded his eldest daughter (Countess Flahault) from all interest in, or benefit from, his estates heritable and moveable, her children only being entitled to succeed in the manner hereinafter specified, under certain conditions as to education, religion, and allegiance.

The entail was, in the first place, to be in favour of the heir male of his Lordship's body first attaining the age of twenty-one, and to the heirs male of his body; whom failing, to the other heirs male of his Lordship's body, and to the heirs male of their body. The parties then called to the estates were these—“whom failing, to the heirs male of the body of the said Margaret Mercer Elphinstone (Countess Flahault) capable of holding and inheriting an estate in the United Kingdom,” and under the conditions above referred to, the Countess Flahault being herself excluded; “whom failing, to Georgina

No. 235. Augusta Henrietta Elphinstone (Mrs Villiers); “whom failing, to the other daughters to be procreated of my body in the order of their seniority, and to the heirs male of their bodies; whom failing, to the heirs female of the body of any heirs or heirs male to be thereafter procreated of my body; whom failing, to the heirs female of the body of the said Margaret Mercer Elphinstone (Countess Flahault),” &c.

July 17, 1857.
Keith's Trustees v. Keith and Others.

The second trust-purpose commenced thus:—“In the event of my leaving no heirs-male of my body as aforesaid, or in case I leave an heir-male of my body, if he shall die without any deed of entail having been executed in his favour, and in case I shall be survived by the said Margaret Mercer Elphinstone, I direct and appoint that the whole foresaid lands and others, directed to be entailed as aforesaid, together with those which may have been or shall be purchased by my said trustees for that purpose as aforesaid, shall be and continue under the direction and management of my said trustees until the death of the said Margaret Mercer Elphinstone, if she shall have no children; and during that period the said trustees shall levy and accumulate the rents and profits thereof, and lay out the same, after deduction of all expenses,” thereinbefore “particularly specified for the event of an entail being executed in favour of an heir-male of my body, in the purchase of lands in Scotland, and entail the same in the same manner, and under the same conditions and others as is herein appointed to be done, with the free residue of my means and estate: But if the said Margaret Mercer Elphinstone shall have an heir-male of her body”—an event which has not occurred—then Lord Keith directed that, under certain conditions, upon such heir-male attaining the age of twenty-one, “and whether the said Margaret Mercer Elphinstone shall then be alive or not,” the trustees should then execute and record an entail of the lands before mentioned “in favour of such heir-male and the heirs-male of his body; whom failing, to the other heirs-male of the body of the said Margaret Mercer Elphinstone; whom failing, to the other heirs of tailzie before mentioned called after them in the first above written destination in their order before specified.”

The rest of the trust-purposes provided for various other contingencies as to the succession, and gave directions as to what should be contained in the deed of entail to be executed by the trustees, and regulated the terms and conditions on which the children of the Countess Flahault should be considered as institutes or heirs under the entail.

By his last will and testament executed in the English form, Lord Keith gave to the same trustees his whole real personal and moveable estate—the residue of which, after a bequest of furniture, or an equivalent of L.1500 in money (which was preferred) to the Dowager Viscountess Keith, was to be sold and applied in paying certain legacies, and the surplus to be invested in the purchase of land in Scotland, to be entailed with the principal estates. Besides his heritable property in Scotland, Viscount Keith left a large succession, consisting of personal or moveable estate in England and Scotland, of real or heritable estate in England, and of money secured over heritable estate in Scotland.

The trustees under the trust-disposition and English will, on his Lordship's death, entered into possession and management of the trust-funds and estates. They paid to the Countess Flahault—the only child of the first marriage—L.16,000, as the amount of the provision to which she was entitled under her mother's marriage-contract. Payments had also been made to the Dowager Viscountess Keith and Mrs Villiers in implement of the obligations under the second marriage-contract, and under the will; but questions having arisen, this action of multiplepoinding was raised in April 1848 in name of the trustees, by the Dowager Viscountess Keith, and others interested in the succession, for the purpose of having their respective rights ascertained and determined. The Dowager Viscountess died in the course of the action, and her claims were taken up by her daughter Mrs Villiers. No. 235.

July 17, 1857.
Keith's Trustees v. Keith and Others.

The Countess Flahault—now Lady Keith—had no sons, but three daughters. She was now between sixty and seventy years of age. Mrs Villiers had no family.

Assuming that all parties acquiesced in the truster's view that all rights of widow and children had been discharged, the trustees had accumulated, and from time to time purchased lands, which they would not and could not have done had they fully anticipated the claims now made, which were as follow :—

I. The Dowager Viscountess Keith claimed one-half, or at least one-third of the free value of the moveable succession of Viscount Keith as her jus relictæ, with interest, and that without repetition of the legacy received by her; and in the event of its being found that she was not so entitled, then she claimed right to make her election betwixt the legacy and her share of the goods in communion.

She pleaded;—That, as widow, she was entitled to her jus relictæ, and that it should be held to amount to one-half of the moveable estate in communion, unless it should appear that there was a subsisting right to legitim at the death of the husband. That the legacy of L.1500 was not incompatible with her claim of jus relictæ; at all events, she was entitled to her election, and this right of election was not barred by having received the legacy, as she did so in ignorance of her rights, and was ready to repeat the amount of the legacy in the event of electing to take her jus relictæ, and of her being bound so to repeat. That the claim of the Countess Flahault to legitim was barred by the terms of the marriage-contract betwixt her parents and the provisions therein made.

II. Mrs Villiers claimed “one-half of the whole free moveable estate and funds left by her deceased father at his death in name of legitim, with interest; or, in the event of its being found that her mother, the Dowager Viscountess Keith, was entitled to jus relictæ, then to one-third of the said whole moveable estate and funds, in name of legitim, with interest, and in either case without prejudice to the claimant's rights, or those of any children whom she may yet have, under Viscount Keith's English trust-deed and will, and to be found entitled both to legitim and to her rights of succession under the said trust-deed and will; these rights, or at all events the rights of her children, not being prejudiced by her taking her legitim; or otherwise, and in the event of its being held that she was not entitled to legitim, and her rights of succession under the said trust-deed and will, the claimant should be found entitled to legitim, her interest under the settlement and will being subject to compensation or allowance, so far as necessary to the party or parties prejudiced by her so taking her legitim, or to be found entitled to make her election. (2.) To be ranked and preferred on the whole fund in medio, in so far as consisting of rents, profits, or accumulations of Lord Keith's whole succession, or at least of the whole of said succession, excepting his Lordships heritable property in Scotland, from the expiry of twenty-one years from his Lordship's death. (3.) To be ranked and preferred on the fund in medio, in so far as consisting of or arising from rents, issues, profits, produce, or accumulations of Lord Keith's heritable estate in Scotland, from 14th August 1848, being the date of the Act 11 & 12 Vict., c. 36. (4.) To be found entitled to have an entail executed in her favour by the trustees, in the form and manner appointed by Lord Keith's trust-settlement, and that quam primum, or as soon as may be, with right to the rents, profits,” &c.

Besides her general pleas applicable to her claim of legitim in addition to her rights under the will, or at all events of a right of election,

No. 235.
 —
 July 17, 1857.
 Keith's Trustees v. Keith
 and Others.

Mrs Villiers pleaded;—(3.) The directions in Viscount Keith's trust-disposition for accumulating the rents, issues, produce or profits of his estate, heritable and moveable, are null and void (except as to his heritable property in Scotland), under the Act 39 and 40 Geo. III. c. 98, and the claimant, as one of his two daughters, and in respect of the terms of his marriage-contract with Miss Mercer, and of his trust-disposition and settlement, and of the foresaid Act, is entitled to the whole accumulations past and future, in so far as contrary to the said Act; and also to the accumulations arising from heritable estate in Scotland, from and after 14th August 1848, in respect of the Act 11 & 12 Vict., c. 36. (4.) The claim of the Countess Flahault to legitim is barred by the terms of the marriage-contract betwixt her parents and the provisions therein made. (5.) In respect of the application of the said Act (commonly called the Thellusson Act), in stopping the intended accumulation of a large part of the trust-fund, the directions to execute an entail must be held to have taken effect as at the date of the application of the said Act, and the claimant is entitled to have an entail executed in her favour, with right to the rents, profits, issues, &c., all in terms of her claim. (6.) Or otherwise, the claimant is entitled to have an entail executed as claimed, with right to the rents, issues, profits, &c., all as claimed, and that in respect of the statute, 11th & 12th Vict., c. 36.

III. The Countess Flahault claimed, 1. To be ranked and preferred upon the fund in medio for one-half of that part of Viscount Keith's succession falling to his children, in name of legitim; or for the whole legitim fund, in the event of Mrs Villiers electing to accept of her provisions under Viscount Keith's second marriage-contract and testamentary settlements, or not being found entitled to any share of the legitim. 2. To be ranked and preferred on the fund in medio for one-half of the rents, or accumulations of the heritable property which belonged to Viscount Keith, and fell under the Thellusson Act, from the expiry of twenty-one years after his Lordship's death; or to the whole of said rents, produce, and accumulations, in the event of Mrs Villiers electing to accept of her provisions under the second marriage-contract and testamentary settlements, or not being found entitled to any share of said rents and accumulations.

She pleaded;—(1.) That, as one of the two children of the late Viscount Keith, she was entitled to be ranked and preferred for legitim, and that she was not barred from claiming her legitim, and the accumulations, by the contract of marriage between her father and mother, the late Viscount Keith, and Miss Jean Mercer, or by his Lordship's testamentary settlements, or otherwise. The claim of Mrs Villiers was not maintainable with reference to the deeds and statutes founded on.

IV. The trustees claimed the whole fund in medio, for the purpose of being applied in terms of the still subsisting appointments and purposes of the trust-settlements, and pleaded;—"1. As the trust-disposition and other deeds were valid and effectual, and as the purposes of the trust were not yet fulfilled, the claimants were entitled to the whole fund in medio. 2. The claim of the Baroness Keith and Nairne was barred by the express discharge and renunciation of her right to legitim, executry, and other claims contained in the antenuptial marriage-contract of her parents. 3. The claim of Mrs Villiers is, as stated, incompetent and unfounded, with reference to its various hypothetical and inconsistent alternative branches. 4. The claim to jus relictæ, legitim, and accumulations respectively made by the Dowager Viscountess Keith, and the Honourable Mrs Villiers, are all discharged or excluded by the deeds condescended on. 5. More particularly, such claims at the instance of Viscountess Keith and Mrs Villiers are, in the circumstances above stated, discharged and excluded by the marriage-settlements executed on the occasion of Lord Keith's second marriage, the import and effect of which settlements fall to be determined according to the law of England, the lex loci contractus et domicilii of both the contracting parties. 6. No. 235. At all events, none of the opposing claimants can maintain the claims stated by them, without deducting or collating the provisions settled upon them respectively by the several marriage-contracts of the truster. 7. The claims of all the claimants are barred by their homologation of Lord Keith's deeds of settlement, and by their acquiescence in the trust-management following thereon, which proceeded on the footing that no such claims existed, or required to be provided for. 8. Generally, the claims made by the other claimants are not, in the circumstances, maintainable with reference to the terms of the statutes founded on by them, and the deeds before-mentioned. 9. At all events, they are inconsistent with their taking the benefit under Lord Keith's marriage-contract and settlements."

July 17, 1857.
Keith's Trustees v Keith and Others.

The Lord Ordinary, on 26th May 1855, pronounced the following interlocutor: — " Finds, 1st, That there has been no such homologation of the trust-settlements of Lord Keith, or of the trust-management following thereon, on the part of the Dowager Viscountess Keith, or of the Baroness Keith and Nairne Countess Flahault, or of the Honourable Mrs Villiers, as to bar them from stating their respective claims, in so far as these are otherwise competent and valid: Finds, 2d, That the claim of the Dowager Viscountess Keith for jus relictæ is not barred or discharged by her marriage-contract of 8th January 1808, nor by her acceptance of the testamentary provision under the general settlements of Lord Keith in 1817, but that she must make her election between her said provision and her jus relictæ, she being first enabled to make such election advisedly by receiving from the trustees of Lord Keith due information in regard to his Lordship's moveable estate: Finds that the claim of jus relictæ extends to one-third part of the moveable estate of the said Lord Keith, deductis debitis, and that, in the event of the Dowager Viscountess electing to take her jus relictæ, she must repeat or impute in satisfaction thereof, pro tanto, the amount of the testamentary provision which she has already received: Finds, 3d, That the Baroness Keith and Nairne Countess Flahault, the only child of Lord Keith by his first marriage, is not barred from claiming legitim by the terms of the antenuptial marriage-contract between her parents in 1787, nor by the terms of the discharges granted by her on receiving payment of her succession under that contract; and that, in a question with her father's trustees, she is not bound to collate or impute, in satisfaction of her legitim, the sums so received by her under the said contract: Finds, 4th, That the Honourable Mrs Villiers, the only child of Lord Keith by his second marriage, is not barred from claiming legitim by the terms of the antenuptial marriage-contract of her parents in 1808; and that, in a question with her father's trustees, she is not bound to collate or impute, in satisfaction of her legitim, the provisions in her favour in said marriage-contract; but reserving for subsequent discussion any question of collation between the Countess Flahault and Mrs Villiers, if hereafter raised: Finds, 5th, That the trust-disposition and settlement of Lord Keith, taken along with his English will and deed of conveyance, form a general and comprehensive settlement of his whole heritable and moveable estate, and that the Honourable Mrs Villiers cannot take benefit under that general settlement and at the same time take her legitim by the operation of law, but must elect between her succession under the said deeds forming the general settlement and her legitim, she being first enabled to make such election advisedly, by receiving from the trustees of Lord Keith due information in regard to his Lordship's moveable estate; therefore sustains the claim of the Dowager Viscountess Keith for jus relictæ if she so elect, subject to repetition and imputation of her said provision, and sustains the claim of the Baroness Keith and Nairne Countess Flahault, and the claim of the Honourable Mrs Villiers, if she so elect, respectively, to that portion of Lord Keith's estate divisible as legitim, sub-

No. 235.
 —
 July 17, 1857.
 Keith's Trustees v. Keith
 and Others.

ject to the said qualifications : Finds, 6th, That the directions in the trust-deed of Lord Keith, for accumulating the rents, profits, and issues of his estate, in so far as it consisted of heritable property in England, or of moveable property, wherever situated, are null and void under the Thellusson Act, the 39th & 40th of George III. cap. 98, from and after the period of twenty-one years from the death of Lord Keith, who died in March 1823: Finds, That the said directions for accumulation of the rents, profits, and issues of Lord Keith's heritable estate in Scotland, are null and void under the Thellusson Act, and under the Act 11th & 12th Victoria, cap. 36, sect. 41, whereby the exception in the Thellusson Act of dispositions respecting heritable property in Scotland is repealed, and the said Act declared to apply to heritable property in Scotland; but that the same are null and void only from the date of the said Act of Victoria (14th August 1848): Finds, 7th, That the Baroness Keith and Nairne Countess Flahault, and the Honourable Mrs Villiers, are entitled, equally between them, to the whole of the accumulations of the said heritable and moveable property, which have become void and null under the Thellusson Act and the said Act of Victoria, from the respective periods above stated, and in time coming: Therefore sustains the claims of the said Baroness Keith and Nairne Countess Flahault, and of the Honourable Mrs Villiers, to the said accumulated rents, profits, and issues, from the periods aforesaid, and in time coming, equally between them: Finds, 8th, That the trustees of Viscount Keith are not, in hoc statu, bound to execute an entail in favour of the claimant, the Honourable Mrs Villiers, as craved by her, but under reservation of her claim to have such entail executed when the trustees shall be in a condition to execute it according to the directions in Lord Keith's trust-deed, and of all answers thereto: Appoints the cause to be enrolled with a view to farther procedure in conformity with these findings: and reserves all questions of expenses." *

* "NOTE.—The Lord Ordinary has not felt much difficulty in disposing of the question involved in the first finding. The plea of homologation or acquiescence was strongly pressed by the trustees, but it does not appear to the Lord Ordinary to be well founded under the circumstances. When such a plea is urged in bar of claims for their legal rights on the part of a widow and children, it must be clearly made out that the acts of homologation or acquiescence founded on were done in the knowledge of their rights, and of the value of the estate to which these rights related; and the Court have been in the practice of refusing effect to the plea of homologation where such knowledge was not established. If the legal rights were discharged by the deeds (a point which is separately disposed of), the question of homologation does not arise; and if they were not discharged by the deeds, then it was the part of the trustees to give full information, and to obtain, if the claimants were so disposed, a complete and valid discharge. The decision of the Court in the case of Ross v. Masson, 3d February 1843, 5 Bell and Murray, p. 483; and particularly the observations of the Lord Justice-Clerk, to the effect that this sort of plea is inadmissible on the part of the trustees of the husband and father, are directly in point. His Lordship says, 'the first duty of the trustees is to make themselves acquainted with the legal claims of widows and children. If these have not been discharged, the trustees must either obtain duly and properly such a discharge, or, as representatives, they are holding for the widow and children, who have legal claims to certain portions of the funds.' Lord Moncreiff, concurring with the Lord Justice-Clerk, says, 'The trustees are to be considered as managing for the widow, with the view to her ultimate election.'

"The claim of the Dowager Viscountess to her jus relictæ is not discharged by her marriage-contract, where there is not only no reference to her Scottish right of jus relictæ, which cannot be discharged by inference or implication merely, but where the terce is discharged, while the jus relictæ is not mentioned, a circumstance which the Lord Ordinary considers of importance, as shewing that her rights, accord-

All parties reclaimed, and the case was argued at great length on the authorities referred to in the Lord Ordinary's note, and on the grounds there mentioned, and noticed in the opinions of the Court.

No. 235.

July 17, 1857.
Keith's Trustees v. Keith
and Others.

ing to Scottish law, were in the view of the parties and within the scope of the deed. The effect given in England to clauses in such terms as those of this marriage-contract, even apart from the specialty arising from the introduction of the terce, is well explained in White and Tudor's Cases, vol. i. p. 247. But, taking the whole clause together, it seems plainly applicable to the claims of the widow against the heritable estate of her husband, and not to her jus relictæ. It was not seriously disputed that the Dowager Lady Keith must elect between her testamentary provision and her jus relictæ, and that, if she elect to take her legal right, she must repeat or impute the provision under Lord Keith's settlement, which she has already received.

"The construction of the marriage-contract of Lord Keith and Miss Mercer, the parents of Countess Flahault, as regards her claim for legitim, is attended with great difficulty. The Lord Ordinary has carefully considered this deed with reference to the authorities, and is of opinion that her right of legitim is not discharged by the deed.

"She is the heir, and the only child of the marriage. She takes nothing under the last settlements of her father, and is excluded from succession to the landed estate directed to be entailed. If the words of the marriage-contract do not discharge her right of legitim, then the subsequent discharges granted by her on receiving the sums paid her by the trustees, cannot have that effect, as there was no intervening consideration, and as the words of acknowledgment and discharge in these documents only extend to the sums received, and cannot prejudice her right to legitim if otherwise valid. Indeed, the very able arguments in regard to this question of discharge, were on both sides directed almost entirely to the terms of the marriage-contract.

"The legitim, or legitima portio, being that portion of the father's moveable estate which the law awards and determines as the 'bairns' part,' is founded on the natural obligation of parents to provide for their children, and arising ex lege from the child's relation to the parent, the right to legitim is so conformable to the law of nature, and so clearly recognised by positive law, that it cannot be discharged by presumption or conjecture, Stair, 3. 8. 45. Ersk. 3. 9. 23. Bankton, 3. 8. 16. In construing a deed said to contain a discharge of legitim, the presumption is against the discharge, and the words importing discharge must be clear and explicit. If, when read along with the whole deed, and by the light afforded by the structure and relative phraseology of the deed, the words founded on can reasonably and fairly bear a construction consistent with the claim of legitim, that construction ought to be adopted.

"Now, such a construction may be put on the marriage-contract of 1787, in so far as regards the heir of the marriage.

"The words more immediately to be construed are, 'which portions above mentioned provided to the children of this marriage in the respective events before specified, are and shall be in full satisfaction to them of all bairns' part of gear, legitim, executry,' &c., and it is necessary to consider the previous structure and language of the deed, in order to ascertain whether these words so apply to the Countess Flahault, and to her succession as heir of the marriage, as to discharge her legitim. Is she, within the meaning of this clause, included in the phrase, 'the children of this marriage,' or being the heir of the marriage, is she beyond the reach of the clause? Is her succession of L.16,000 one of the 'portions above mentioned?' Is it provided to her in any of the 'respective events above specified?'

"That the words 'children of the marriage' may include the heir, cannot be disputed. It was so decided in the case of Maitland v. Maitland, 14th December 1843 (6 B. and M., p. 244.) But whether in any particular deed they do include the heir or not, is a question to be resolved on consideration of the whole deed.

"In the earlier part of this marriage-contract, and while dealing with a sum of L.10,000, afterwards included in the sum of L.16,000, the words, 'provisions to children of this marriage,' seem to be used generally, and may include all the children. But afterwards, when specially dealing with the whole sum of L.16,000,

No. 235. At advising, of this date,—

July 17, 1857.
Keith's Trustees v. Keith
and Others.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The first point disposed of by the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor is the plea of homologation and acquiescence maintained by the trustees in their the distinction between heirs of the marriage and children of the marriage, is clearly brought out. The word 'children' in the succeeding part of the deed, with reference to this sum, does not include the heir.

"Lord Keith binds himself to provide and secure on land, or other sufficient security, L.16,000, which he destines, 1st, to himself, and the sons of the marriage one after another, and their heirs; 2d, to his sons by any subsequent marriage, and their heirs; 3d, to his daughters by this marriage, and their heirs, the eldest succeeding without division, whom all failing, to his own heirs and assignees whatsoever. This destination is not confined to the children of the first marriage, for a son by a subsequent marriage might have succeeded: Then follows an express declaration, that the said sum of L.16,000 is provided to 'the heirs of this marriage,' not only under burden of the provision to the widow, but also 'under the burden of suitable portions and provisions to the children of this marriage, or their descendants, other than the heir of the marriage succeeding as aforesaid, which provisions are to be made and proportioned by Lord Keith at any time of his life.' Here it is to be observed, that the heir of the marriage takes the L.16,000 as a succession (the taking being described as 'succeeding as aforesaid,') not as a portion, while the children of the marriage other than the heir are to be provided with 'suitable portions and provisions to be made and proportioned by Lord Keith,' and which are secured by being created a burden on the succession of the heir of the marriage. What the heir of the marriage takes is a sum provided and secured, to which he or she succeeds; what the children of the marriage other than the heir take, is a suitable portion allotted by the father and charged upon the succession of the heir. Then follows a clause providing for the failure, on the part of Lord Keith, to make the provisions for the younger children effectual, by allotting 'suitable portions;' and throughout this clause, the distinction between the heir of the marriage and children of the marriage other than the heir, is carefully preserved. Then follows another clause, providing for the event of the exclusion of the daughters of the first marriage from their succession, by the birth of an heir-male of a subsequent marriage, declaring that, in such event, one daughter shall have L.5000, two daughters L.8000, and three or more daughters L.10,000, by such proportions and divisions as Lord Keith might think fit to make; and failing such division, the said sums, 'in the respective events foresaid,' shall fall and divide equally among them, and 'which provisions in the events above mentioned,' are payable at the first term after Lord Keith's death, with interest of the 'said portions' from the said term of payment. After this comes the particular clause above quoted, from which it is said the discharge of legitim by the heir of the marriage is to be gathered: and the words of the clause must be construed, with such aid as can be obtained from the previous part of the deed.

"But throughout this deed it is plain, 1st, that the term 'portion' is not applied to the whole sum of L.16,000, nor to the succession of the heir of the marriage; 2d, that the discharge by the children of the marriage is in respect of the said portions provided to them, while these portions constitute not the succession of the heir of the marriage, but the 'suitable portions' forming the burden imposed on that succession; and, 3d, that the portions so provided, and in respect of which legitim is discharged, are provided 'in the respective events above specified,' these words being applicable to the previous provision in regard to children other than the heir, and not applicable to the succession of the heir.

"On these grounds, and without questioning the rule laid down in the case of Maitland, where, with reference to the terms of that deed, the heir was held to be included among the children of the marriage, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that, looking to the very peculiar structure and phraseology of this contract, the legitim of Countess Flahault is not discharged.

"In regard to Mrs Villiers' claim of legitim, there seems to be really no ground on which it can be maintained that it has been discharged by the marriage-contract of her parents.

seventh plea in law. The Lord Ordinary finds that no effect should be given to that plea as regards any of the three claimants here, viz., the Dowager Lady No. 235.

July 17, 1857.
Keith's Trustees v. Keith and Others.

"The question of collation or imputation of the marriage-contract provisions must next be considered. It is a question of extreme nicety, and the circumstances under which it arises should be steadily kept in view. There are only two children of Lord Keith, and, of course, only two parties interested in the legitim. Neither of these children, who are heiresses-portioners, have hitherto stated the plea of collation or imputation of provision, and both concurred in maintaining the proposition that no such collation or imputation can be enforced. The plea is urged only by the trustees of Lord Keith, not for the purpose of distributing the legitim, in which they are not interested, but for the purpose of increasing the dead's part.

"The Lord Ordinary, after some hesitation, is of opinion that the plea, so urged, is not well-founded, and that neither of the sisters is bound to collate her marriage contract provision, or to impute it pro tanto in satisfaction of her legitim.

"Collatio bonorum inter liberos, has been introduced into our system of jurisprudence from the Roman law, for the purpose of preserving equality in the distribution of the legitim, (Dig. Lib. 37 cap. 6); and it is to be observed, 1st, That it applies to the distribution of legitim; and 2dly, That it is inter liberos only, and for the purpose of creating equality. There is no principle to support the application of collation to the ascertainment of legitim; it is only legitimately applicable to the distribution of legitim. In other words, collation prevails among the claimants competing for legitim, and has no place beyond the sphere of that competition. It is so laid down expressly by Lord Stair (B. 3, T. 8, sec. 45, 46) who says, 'Collation is only a remedy introduced in law to keep equality among the children, who have an equal interest in their father and his moveables.' Mr Erskine says, 'For preserving an equality in the distribution of the legitim among the younger sons entitled to it, we have adopted the doctrine of the Roman law,' (B. 3, T. 9, sec. 24;) and again, 'as this kind of collation was introduced that equal justice may be done to all who have a right to the legitim, it does not affect the rights of third parties,' (B. 3, T. 9, sec. 25.) Accordingly it has been decided, (Ross v. Kellie, 27th February 1627, Mor. 2366; Trotter v. Rothead, 12th January 1681, Mar. 2375; and Lady Balmain v. Glenfarquhar, 11th December 1719, M. 2378,) and is stated by all the authorities as settled, that a child is not bound to collate in a question with the widow so as to increase the jus relictæ. Lord Stair says, 'Collation hath no place as to the wife;' and again, "it was not introduced to keep an equality between the wife and the children;" and Erskine explains the law in the same manner, both in his Institutes and his Principles. (Prin. 3, 9, 10; Inst. ut supra.) So, in a case reported by Lord Kilkerran (Justice v. Justice's Disponees, 10th November 1737, M. 8166,) it was found that an heir is not obliged to collate heritage with disponees, because 'collation is a privilege personal and peculiar to the executor-at-law, and to no other.' This related to a collation by the heir in heritage, but the principle of restricting it to its appropriate sphere was fully recognised. In like manner, and for the same reasons, collation does not take place as to the dead's part. This was at one time doubted, but it is now so decided. If there be no demand for collation by a child entitled to legitim, then a trustee, or residuary legatee, of the father seeking to increase the dead's part, cannot enforce collation. This was expressly decided in the case of Wright's Trustees (Clark v. Burns and Stewart, 27th January 1835, 3 S. and D. 326,) where Lord Moncreiff laid it down as law, that 'collation does not take place as to the dead's part;' and in that part of his Note the Court unanimously concurred, though the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Medwyn differed on another point. In deciding the well-known case of Hog v. Lashley in 1804, Lord Eldon says, 'collation is only between those entitled to legitim. (Paton's App. Cases, v. 4, p. 642; and Lord Corehouse, in the Note to his judgment in the case of Andrews v. Sawyer, 2d March 1836 (14 S. and D. p. 589,) says, 'if the defender is not entitled to legitim, no question of collation can occur in this process.' The effect of the defender not being entitled to legitim in the case of Andrews v. Sawyer would have been to have only one claimant, and thus to exclude collation. In other particulars, this opinion of Lord Corehouse in Sawyer's case, has been de-

No. 235. Keith, the Countess Flahault, and the Honourable Mrs Villiers. There was not much argument upon that point, and I shall content myself with expressing my entire concurrence with the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

July 17, 1857.
Keith's Trustees v. Keith
and Others.

prived of authority by the decision in Fisher v. Dixon; but in regard to limiting the plea of collation to those entitled to legitim it remains unshaken.

"But the decision in the case of Lord Breadalbane against the Marquis of Chandos, 20th January 1836, (14 S. and D. p. 309,) affirmed in the House of Lords, 16th August 1836 (2 Sh. and M.L. 377) is completely in point, and of the highest authority, having been a unanimous decision of the Court of Session, affirmed without hesitation by the House of Lords, the Lord Chancellor and Lord Lyndhurst concurring in the judgment. This decision settles the point that collatio bonorum is a plea inter liberos, and in distribution of legitim, and not a plea which can be maintained against a child by a party not sharing the legitim. It also decides that if there is no collation there is no other principle to support a plea of imputation of marriage-contract provisions to legitim.

"It is true that a different decision was pronounced in the House of Lords in 1726, in the case of Nisbet v. Nisbet, where the judgment of the Court of Session was reversed, (M. 8181, and Robertson's App. 594,) and it appears that the reversal by the House of Lords in the case of Nisbet was not referred to in the case of Breadalbane.

"But after anxious perusal of both cases the Lord Ordinary has arrived at the conclusion that the decision in the case of Breadalbane v. Chandos is in accordance with the true principles of the law of collation, and is of the higher as well as of the more recent authority. The limitation of collation to the distribution of the legitim, and the rejection of the plea, when urged by a party not entitled to legitim, is in conformity with the opinion of Lord Stair, Mr Erskine, Bankton, and many previous decisions.

"But if collation be held inapplicable then there is no solid ground for the plea that the provision must be imputed to the legitim. There are, indeed, traces in our law of a doctrine of imputation or advancement, apart from collation; and the doctrine rests on presumed intention, the maxim being 'debitor non presumitur donare.' But, so far as the Lord Ordinary has been able to discover, there is no authority for sustaining a plea of imputation towards legitim, where collation for distribution of legitim is not demanded, and where the plea of imputation is urged for the purpose of increasing the dead's part, and by a party not entitled to legitim. The principle on which the case of Nisbet was decided in the House of Lords does not clearly appear from the report; but if it be read as a decision, that, without collation, and in a question with a third party, a marriage contract provision is to be imputed to legitim, so as to diminish the fund of legitim, then it is without support from any other authority of weight, and is directly opposed not only to the judgment in the case of Breadalbane, but to the opinion of Lord Eldon in Lashley v. Hog, and to other decisions. The maxim 'debitor non presumitur donare' does not really apply to such a case. The father is not, during his life, in the proper sense, debtor to the child in the legitim. He may invest his whole funds in land. Lord Fullerton so explains it in his opinion in Fisher v. Dixon, 16th June 1840 (2 Dun. p. 1121.) He says, 'The relation of father and child in regard to the legitim during the life of the father, is not a relation of debtor and creditor at all. The father is not the debtor in any debt, either present, postponed, or contingent.' This explanation was concurred in by Lord Murray, Lord Mackenzie, and Lord Medwyn. On the other hand, the provision in the present case was made by antenuptial contract, before there was, or could be, in any view a debt due by the father. In these circumstances, there is no room for the application of the maxim, 'debitor non presumitur donare,' nor for the doctrine of presumed imputation or advancement resting on that maxim.

"Since, therefore, there is here no demand for collation inter liberos,—since collation cannot be demanded by one not entitled to legitim, and has no place as to the dead's part,—since the maxim, 'debitor non presumitur donare' does not apply, and the presumption on which the plea of imputation rests is thus excluded, there are no grounds for holding that Countess Flahault or Mrs Villiers must, in a question with the trustees, impute their marriage-contract provisions to legitim.

The second finding of the Lord Ordinary relates to the Dowager Viscountess Keith's claim for jus relictæ. She is now represented by Mrs Villiers, who insists

No. 235.

July 17, 1857.

Keith's Trustees v. Keith and Others.

"The fifth finding in regard to the election by Mrs Villiers, between her right of succession under the settlements of Lord Keith and her legitim, is not inconsistent with the previous findings in regard to the marriage-contract provisions.

"It is quite settled, by the cases of Henderson, 1782 (M. 8191), of Collier, 6th July 1833, of Lord Breadalbane against the Duchess of Buckingham, 5th March 1840, and of Fisher against Dixon, 6th July 1841, that where there is a general settlement of the whole estate of the testator, a claim of legitim is incompatible with such settlement; and a child cannot approbate the settlement by taking under it, and at the same time reprobate the settlement by taking legitim. A claim of legitim is incompatible with a total settlement. Such a settlement carries everything, including dead's part and legitim, unless challenged as regards legitim, by one having right thereto. But the party challenging cannot take benefit under the deed challenged. The English doctrine of equitable compensation, founded on by the counsel for Mrs Villiers, does not appear to the Lord Ordinary to be applicable to such a case as the present (case of Streatfield and other cases in White and Truror's Leading Cases, vol. i. p. 233), and it would be hazardous to attempt to introduce such a doctrine, the true import and application of which we do not fully understand, into the adjudication of a question on which the law of Scotland has been decided with such authority.

"The application of the Thellusson Act to the directions to accumulate in Lord Keith's trust-deed, also raises a question of importance. The object of this statute, as clearly expressed therein, was to prevent the accumulation of rents, profits, &c., whether of real or of personal property, for any period longer than the life of the granter, or twenty-one years from his death. From the general enactment by which this object is effected, there is an express exception in section 3, where it is provided, 'that nothing in this Act contained shall extend to any disposition respecting heritable property in Scotland;' and in this case the application of the statute is to be considered, 1st, In regard to the moveable estate wherever situated, and the real estate in England; and, 2dly, In regard to the heritable property in Scotland.

"With respect to the moveable estate and the English real estate, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the directions to accumulate, in Lord Keith's trust-deed, are void under the Act, from 1844, being twenty-one years after the death of Lord Keith. The trust-deed of Lord Keith, and the deed of conveyance and last will relative thereto, contain, when read together, a conveyance to his trustees of the whole estate, real and personal, in England or Scotland, of the testator, for the purposes of the trust; and one of the leading purposes of this trust was to accumulate the rents and proceeds of the residue of the estate, and apply the accumulations in the purchase of lands in Scotland, to be entailed, as directed by the deed, on the heir-male of the body of Lord Keith when he should attain majority, and in other events on a different series of heirs, as fully explained and directed in the deed. In the event, which has occurred, of Lord Keith leaving no heir-male of his body, and of his daughter the Countess Flahault having no male issue, then the direction to the trustees was to accumulate the rents and proceeds during the life of Countess Flahault, and thereafter to entail the purchased lands in favour of the Honourable Mrs Villiers, and the heirs-male of her body, whom failing, the other heirs of entail mentioned in the trust-deed. The test of the application of the rule, or of the exception, in the Thellusson Act, is to be found in the character of the property of which the rents and profits are directed to be accumulated. In this case it was a 'residue' of a general estate, heritable and moveable, in England and in Scotland. Lands in Scotland are to be purchased with the accumulated fund, and the rents of the purchased lands, or in other words, the annual proceeds of the produce of the accumulations, are to be again accumulated till the period arrive for winding up the trust and executing an entail of the Scottish landed estate. But the nucleus or centre of the accumulations, around which the rents and proceeds are to be wound as they annually arise, was the residue of the whole estate conveyed to the trustees; and, except in so far as regards the heritable property in Scotland so conveyed, this process of accumulation appears to the Lord Ordinary

No. 235.
 —
 July 17, 1857.
 Keith's Trustees v. Keith and Others.

in the claim. This is a very important point in the case. The Lord Ordinary has held that the Countess Dowager had not discharged her right of jus relictæ, and to be opposed to the enactments of the Thellusson Act, and therefore to be only legal for twenty-one years after Lord Keith's death. The decision in the case of Ogilvie's Trustees against the Kirk Session of Dundee, 18th July 1846 (8 Bell and Murray, p. 1229) in which the Thellusson Act was applied by the Court, though heritable subjects in Scotland were conveyed to trustees as part of a general estate, of which 'the balance' was directed to be accumulated for a hundred years, is not opposed to the view now expressed. In that case the trustees had a power of sale which it was necessary to exercise, in order to create the balance, which formed what the Lord President called 'the nest-egg of the accumulations,' or 'the foundation of the fund.' The attempt to bring the case within the exception in the Thellusson Act failed, and the rule of that Act was enforced. In the present case the foundation of the fund to be accumulated, and that which gave a character to the subsequent accumulations, was (in so far as it did not consist of heritable property in Scotland) within the rule of the Thellusson Act; and if, in order to bring it within the exception, it were only necessary to provide that the accumulated funds should be invested in land in Scotland, of which the rents should continue to be accumulated, this would substantially be to set at nought the provisions of the statute. It is not from considering the object to which the accumulations are to be applied, but from considering the character of the property from which the accumulations are to be gathered, that any just criterion can be obtained for applying the rule or the exception in the Thellusson Act, prior to the recent statute of her present Majesty.—(Hargrave on the Thellusson Act, p. 19).

"In regard to the validity of the direction to accumulate the rents of the heritable property in Scotland conveyed by Lord Keith to his trustees, it is necessary to consider the provisions of the 11 & 12 Victoria, cap. 36. Before the date of that statute, passed in 1848, for amendment of the law of entail, the Thellusson Act applied to moveable property in Scotland, as well as elsewhere, and to real property in England; but 'dispositions respecting heritable property in Scotland' were excepted. By the 41st section of the 11 & 12 Victoria, the exception is simply repealed, and the Act declared to apply to heritable property in Scotland.

"There was no new law—no original legislative provision—but merely the withdrawal from the Thellusson Act of an exception to its general principle, leaving the Act in unrestricted operation. The effect of this is, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, to stop the accumulation of the rents of heritable property in Scotland in the same manner as the accumulation of the proceeds of moveable property wherever situated, and of the rents of real property in England, is stopped by the Thellusson Act. The accumulation under Lord Keith's deed in so far as regarded his other property, stopped in 1844, by force of the Thellusson Act, and would have then stopped in regard to his Scottish heritage, but for the exception. The withdrawal of the exception let in the rule, and stopped from the date of the Act (1848) repealing the exception, that accumulation which till then had been sustained by the exception against the rule. The phraseology of the two statutes differs, and the difference, which is plainly not accidental, tends to support the view now taken. The Thellusson Act is entitled 'An Act to restrain trusts and directions in deeds or wills, whereby,' &c., and its enactments take the form of restrictions on dispositions or deeds, while the exception relates to 'dispositions respecting heritable property in Scotland.' But the Act of Victoria, which was framed to amend the law of entail, and which, in many of its provisions, related to deeds executed prior to its date, repeals the exception in the Thellusson Act, and extends and applies that Act not to 'dispositions respecting heritable property in Scotland,' which might to some extent have supported the construction that it applied only to deeds subsequently executed, but to 'heritable property in Scotland,' thus dealing, not with the deed which directs the accumulation, but with the property of which the rents are directed to be accumulated. When considered as a relative Act, qualifying and amending a previous Act, by withdrawing an exception which restricted its application, the 41st section of the Act of Victoria, may receive effect from its date in stopping accumulation of rents of heritable property in Scotland, without infringing was not barred by her marriage-contract of 1808 from claiming it. The conclusion at which I have arrived, after repeatedly perusing that deed, is in accordance with that of the Lord Ordinary. I am of opinion that, under that deed, the claim of jus relictæ is not barred or discharged. The deed is English in its structure and phraseology. It is executed in England between parties residing there, and who were contracting marriage there. The place of Lord Keith's domicile at that time is not made matter of admission. The trustees say that he was domiciled in England. The respondents deny, or at least will not admit that: The deed deals with Viscount Keith's estates—English and Scotch. No. 235.

July 17, 1857.
Keith's Trustees v. Keith and Others.

The clause founded on as a discharge of the Dowager Viscountess Keith's right of jus relictæ does not, in terms, discharge that right. The term jus relictæ does not occur in it. Now this omission—looking to the history of the deed, it being so much of an English deed—is remarkable, almost irreconcilable, if the framer of the clause was aware of the existence of that Scotch right, of its nature and effect, and had intended to exclude it. I do not think any Scotch lawyer would have so framed the clause, intending to exclude it. But it was contended that the clause contained words broad enough to exclude the right, whether these words were used with the design to exclude it or not. I do not so read the clause. I think that the clause was intended to have effect, as excluding rights that might be competent under the Law of England or under the Law of Scotland, and I do not wonder that the framer of the deed, obviously framing it as an English deed in structure and phraseology, and between parties residing in England, and contracting marriage there, did take care to introduce a clause that would be operative, with reference to the law with which he was acquainted, and the rights that might arise under it. But the clause deals with both laws, and deals with them in separate branches of the clause. The lady accepts of her jointure, and in lieu and full bar and satisfaction of the dower or thirds, which at common law and by custom she can or otherwise might claim “from the estates of Lord Keith,” and also in full “bar and satisfaction of the terce to which she is or otherwise might be entitled by the law of Scotland.”

Here the law of Scotland is brought in, in contradistinction to something called the principles generally regulating the construction of statutes. The case of Urquhart against Urquhart, 20th February 1851 (Ses. Rep. vol. xiii. p. 742), referred to by the trustees, which related to a different section of the Entail Amendment Act, whereby a new and important enactment, altering the previous law, was introduced, after litis contestation, is not in point, both because the repeal of an exception is different from the enactment of a new law, and because of the peculiar terms in which the 41st section of the Entail Amendment Act is expressed. (See also Phillips v. Hopwood, 5 M. & R., p. 15, and Dwarries on Statutes, pp. 534, 535, and the case of Webster, 6th December 1853, under the 16th and 17th Vict., cap. 53).

“If the Lord Ordinary is right in holding the Thellusson Act, and the 41st section of the Entail Amendment Act, applicable to this trust, from the respective dates of 1844 and 1848, the trust-management will still continue till the proper period for winding up the trust; for the trust is well constituted, though the direction to accumulate fails: but the result will be, that the whole directions to accumulate after these dates being null and void, the two claimants, the Countess Flahault and the Honourable Mrs Villiers, as the only children of Lord Keith, will succeed equally to these subsequent accumulations, and to the lands purchased or directed to be purchased therewith. Apart from the directions to accumulate, there is no conveyance to defeat their right. They are the nearest of kin, and so entitled to take up the intestate succession in moveables; and they are heiresses-portioners, entitled to succeed to the landed estate not otherwise disposed of; so that, in the absence of any effectual conveyance of the residue, a case of intestacy arises, and to that intestate succession the claimants have right equally, whether it be moveable or heritable.—(Hargrave on the Thellusson Act).

“Other questions in regard to the amount of the fund in medio, to the calculation of interest, and to the application of the costs of trust-management, &c., remain to be disposed of; but on these it would be premature now to offer any observations.”

No. 235.
 —
 July 17, 1857.
 Keith's Trustees v. Keith
 and Others

the common law or custom. Therefore the common law or custom is meant to represent something else than the law of Scotland, and the object for which the common law or custom is called in is to exclude the right of "dower" or "thirds"—terms not applicable to the law of Scotland. "Dower" is not a Scotch law phrase. It is an English law phrase, and, moreover, is a right as to the nature of which there is great discussion. It certainly is not a Scotch law phrase in the sense in which it is there used. We sometimes use the phrase "dower," but never as covering jus relictæ. "Dos" or "tocher" is a different thing, but that also is totally different from the right of jus relictæ. "Thirds" is not a Scotch law phrase; I have seen the word in a matter of teinds prior to the annexation, but in nothing else that I recollect of. Therefore, in the first place, these two things are not Scotch, but English law rights, and, in the next place, they are to be excluded, as what would, if not so excluded, be claimable "by common law or by custom;" and lastly, common law or custom are introduced as something different from the law of Scotland, because common law and custom are referred to in regard to one thing, while the law of Scotland is referred to in regard to another. The right in reference to which the law of Scotland is brought in is the right of terce, and the right of terce alone. Therefore, as I read this clause, it does not touch the right of jus relictæ, and, being of that opinion, I concur with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that that right is not excluded under this clause.

The next point raised by the interlocutor relates to the Countess Flahault's right of legitim—whether it is barred by the marriage-contract of Lord Keith with his first wife in 1787. That is the question attended with most difficulty in this case, and for some time I was doubtful as to the conclusion at which I should arrive in regard to it. But, upon full consideration, I have come to be of an opinion different from that of the Lord Ordinary. I am of opinion that the right of legitim claimed by Countess Flahault is barred—that is, that she is included, and her interest is included in that clause, which provides that the "portions above mentioned, provided to the children of this marriage in the respective events before specified, are and shall be in full satisfaction to them of all bairns' part of gear, legitim, executry, and every thing else they can ask or claim by and through the decease of the said George Keith Elphinstone, their father, in any manner of way, except further what he shall think fit to provide to them of his own good will." The Lord Ordinary has put his judgment on this part of the case upon the reading of the clause of exclusion as not embracing the heir or heir's interest in the L.16,000, and very much on the nature of that interest as being one of succession, and not properly of provision. That element of its being a right to be taken by succession, in consequence of the destination in that part of the clause in which Viscount Keith binds himself to secure L.16,000, in which the L.10,000 is declared to be included—was a part of the case that pressed my mind very much. But, upon looking to the whole deed—and I think that is the proper way to deal with it—it appears to me that, in whatever form, it is a money provision made in the marriage-contract for the whole children of the marriage. That the term "children of the marriage" may include and ought to include the heir, the Lord Ordinary holds to be in conformity with the case of Maitland. But he thinks that the peculiar structure and phraseology of this deed excluded that construction. I think this is a money provision for all the children, including the heir, and although the terms of it make it a provision to the heir, burdened with certain rights in favour of the younger children, yet it is a money provision under the marriage-contract to all the children of the marriage, to the heir as well as to the younger children. They are all benefited by it. They are all creditors under the contract. That being so, the object of the clause now founded on is to exclude the right of legitim from all the parties who benefit by that provision. There are no limiting words in it. It affects all the children alike. A good deal of ingenious criticism was made on the variation of phraseology in different parts of this deed. There is no uniformity such as can be founded on as giving a meaning to the word "portion" in this part of the deed, different from the word "provisions"—viz., for all the children of the marriage, and, therefore, I have come to the conclusion that the Countess Flahault, the heir of the marriage, claiming this right, is within the scope of that clause I have referred to, and that being so, I differ from the Lord Ordinary as to the result. I think that right is barred.

The next point is in regard to Mrs Villiers' right of legitim. It stands on a different footing altogether. The contract of marriage is different, and I do not think it necessary to go into that point at any length, for I see no ground for holding that her legitim is discharged. No. 235.
July 17, 1857.
Keith's Trustees v. Keith and Others.

But there is a question raised as to collation and imputing. Now, I do not think this is a case for collation. What is contended for is collation, not inter liberos, but as between Mrs Villiers and the trustees. That is an application of the principle of collation which I cannot recognise. It is quite contrary to the principle described in Stair and Erskine, and as fully recognised in the first case of Breadalbane in 1836. No doubt the case of Nisbet, decided in 1726, has been cited as an adverse authority; and as reported by the late Mr Robertson, who dragged it to light from its obscurity, it would appear to be a decision adverse, in some points of it, to the principle recognised by others with which we are familiar. On no point decided in the case of Nisbet have we full or satisfactory accounts of the ground of decision. But, however that may be, the case slumbered for a hundred years, and has had no effect on the law since the date of its discovery. It has been disregarded. It goes for nothing; and at this distance of time, after deliberate judgments, such as that in the case of Breadalbane, we cannot allow such a case to upset the law established both before its decision and for a century afterwards. But if we were to decide this point of new, I would go along with the decision in the case of Breadalbane. Therefore, on principle, I am not much moved by the case of Nisbet. I hold that there is here no room for collation.

Then as to imputing, I do not know very well what that was meant to represent as different from collation. Lord Keith had no powers over the rights of legitim. As between the children, I do not see wherein it is different from collation.

The next finding of the interlocutor relates to Mrs Villiers' right to elect, and her obligations to elect in reference to her interest under the general settlement. Upon that point I think that Mrs Villiers must make an election. She cannot take both legitim and the rights under the general settlement. There is no want of authority for that, and I go entirely along with the Lord Ordinary in his remarks upon the cases of Fisher, Breadalbane, Henderson, and Collier. The point is not now debateable. There is a whole chain of authority in regard to it.

The only remaining question is, whether Mrs Villiers is bound to make her election now? Being of opinion that she cannot take both legitim and the rights under the settlement, I am also of opinion that if she now, with her eyes open, takes legitim, she necessarily repudiates the settlement. She proposes to take it in the meantime, and that afterwards, if she finds it to be for her interest, she shall undo that taking of it. That will not do, for the meaning of election is, that she shall make her election now. The legitim is now exigible. It may be very inconvenient for her to make her election now, but that is of no consequence to the case. It is very inconvenient for every one else that she should not make her election, nor is there any reason why she should not do so. She says she cannot ascertain the measure of her future rights, that they are uncertain, and that it is hard to compel her to make her election before she knows the full value of what her interest may be under the settlement, which depends on a variety of circumstances, such as the duration of lives and other contingencies. These are all contingencies attached to the interest. There are very few interests that do not have inconveniencies as well as conveniencies attached to them. But the parties who are put to an option must balance these advantages and disadvantages as they best can. I see no reason for allowing the proposal of Mrs Villiers, which is quite novel, and, I think, inconsistent with principle; and, therefore, I think that Mrs Villiers must elect now. She will be entitled to every information which circumstances will admit of, to enable her to exercise her choice to the best advantage.

The application of the Thellusson Act raises a difficult question. I have had on a previous occasion to consider it, and I have felt some hesitation as to my previous impressions being correct. The Lord Ordinary has come to a conclusion different from what I have arrived at. It is quite clear that the Thellusson Act strikes at accumulations so far as regards heritable property in England, and so far as regards moveable property in either country, from twenty-one years after the death of Lord Keith. That period expired in 1844. The trustees contend that the accumulations from 1844 till 1848 stood in one predicament, and the accu-

No. 235.
—
July 17, 1857.
Keith's Trustees v. Keith
and Others.

mulations from 1848 in another predicament, because of the passing of the Act 11 & 12 Vict., cap. 36, in 1848, which, it is contended, affected the accumulations of the rents of heritable property in Scotland from the date of the passing of that Act. From 1844 till 1848, the trustees maintain they had a clear right to the accumulations. The subsequent accumulations they do not so strongly contend for. The whole question, therefore, now to determine is, whether this Extension Act of the 11 & 12 Vict. strikes at accumulations going on under the direction of deeds previously executed; that is to say, whether it is directed against accumulations accruing after 1848 under deeds previously executed, or whether it is only directed against accumulations to take place under directions to be given by deeds executed after the passing of the Act? Now both Acts are rather peculiar in their structure and expression. The Thellusson Act excepted from its operation dispositions of heritable property in Scotland. It had no effect, and was not intended to have effect, as regards such heritable property. But it affected heritable property in England, and personal estate in Scotland; and, as it was an alteration of the existing law, and of the powers of parties over their rights, it contained this clause (sect. 4):—"That the restrictions in this Act shall take effect and be enforced with respect to wills and testaments made and executed before the passing of this Act, in such cases only where the devisor or testator shall be living and of sound and disposing mind, after the expiration of twelve calendar months from the passing of this Act."

Now this clause consists of two parts—first, a positive enactment to make the restrictions of the statute apply to wills and testaments executed before the passing of the Act; but, while making the restrictions by direct and positive enactment extend to such wills, it qualifies that direct and positive enactment by saying it shall extend to such wills "only where the devisor and testator be living and of sound and disposing mind, after the expiration of twelve calendar months from the passing of this Act."

The object of that exception is very obvious: Such deeds being under the control of the parties themselves, could be altered by them, and the statute gave them time and opportunity for doing so. If they did not alter the deeds, then it was to be presumed that they acquiesced in this statute being operative on the succession. Without positive enactment, I am not prepared to say that it would have reached such deeds at all. But there is the positive enactment, and the qualification with reference to the deeds to which it is to apply; and the reason of the positive enactment was perhaps to make it clear that it would extend to such deeds. The qualification, again, was to prevent the extension from operating unjustly, and to enable parties to bring their estates within it.

The Act of the 11 & 12 Vict. extends the operation of the Thellusson Act to Scotland in this way:—"Whereas an Act was passed (setting forth the Thellusson Act by title), by which Act it is provided and enacted, 'that nothing in this Act contained shall extend to any disposition respecting heritable property within that part of Great Britain called Scotland,' and it is expedient that the provisions of the said Act should be extended to heritable property in Scotland." That is the preamble. Then it goes on—"Be it enacted, that the said provision and enactment of the said recited Act shall be, and the same is hereby repealed, and the said Act shall in future apply to heritable property in Scotland." That is to say, heritable property in Scotland shall be no longer excepted from the prohibition against accumulations for a period beyond twenty-one years, and that parties cannot any longer keep their property out of the operation of that Act. But there is no positive enactment, as in the Thellusson Act, that it shall extend to deeds that have been already executed.

The general principle for construing statutes is, that they are not to strike against deeds already executed, and rights already created, and interests already settled and vested. There is here no positive declaration that the statute shall strike against such rights and interests; nor do I see any words to force us into such a construction, which I think would be a great violation of the general principle of construction; nor do I see any reason why the same course would not have been adopted here as in the Thellusson Act, if the statute had been intended to have that effect. There is then no declaration that it shall extend to deeds already executed; and, in the second place, there is no declaration that parties shall have a

No. 235.

July 17, 1857:
Keith's Trustees v. Keith
and Others.

time given them for altering such deeds. There being neither positive enactment nor power given to arrange peoples' affairs, if the enactment were to be extended by implication to deeds previously executed, it would be a new mode of dealing with such matters and such interests; and, therefore, I have come to the conclusion that, although the provisions of the Thellusson Act are now imported into Scotland as regards heritable property, it only ties the hands of parties for the future from the date of the passing of the 11 & 12 Viet., cap. 36, and does not take away accumulations that have been made and perhaps applied in the way directed by a testator during the period that has intervened between the date of his settlement—perhaps many years old—and the passing of the Act. It is not to interfere with the declarations and directions made by previous deeds. Upon that principle, I am of opinion that the Thellusson Act does not strike against these accumulations.

The seventh finding of the Lord Ordinary deals with the accumulated sums in so far as the Thellusson Act does strike against them;—that is to say, the rents of the heritable property in England, or the proceeds of personal estate in either country. Upon that point, I agree with the Lord Ordinary that the interest there goes to both of Lord Keith's daughters equally among them. It is to be regarded very much as intestate succession. The trustees have no power to apply it in any way. It is excluded by the Thellusson Act; and, in that view, I think it must be regarded substantially as intestate succession.

LORD IVORY.—I agree in all the points to which your Lordship has spoken, but on some of them not without great difficulty. I start with the claim of the Countess Flahault for legitim,—with reference to which we have to consider the marriage contract of 1787. I am not moved by the verbal and grammatical criticism raised upon the words "portion" and "provisions" with regard to their situation and correlation to similar words in the previous part of the deed. This deed is not constructed in such an artistic and accurate manner as to make that which is never a safe rule of construction applicable here. But I adopt your Lordship's plan, and read the whole deed. It is a mutual contract, and I read it to learn the intention of parties in regard to all the clauses, and more especially in regard to the clause as to the discharge of legitim.

In that broad and general view, the first thing that strikes one is that the parties contract for two sets of provisions—one for the widow, another for the children of the marriage. It is specifically set forth in the most express terms that the provisions are for the children of the marriage,—that is, for the whole children of the marriage; making every individual member of the family a creditor in his share of the provisions—making the provision itself a debt against the contracting party in whatsoever way it shall be distributed, in portions or shares, among the family. Now, with reference to this, there are two passages in the beginning of the deed most important to be kept in view. There are L.500 to be secured to the widow, and there is an obligation to purchase lands or give other security for L.10,000, and that at and against the term of Martinmas next to come, which sum is to be secured "for the said Jean Mercer, her liferent use allenary, for security and payment to her of said annuity," "and afterwards for security and payment pro tanto of the provisions after-mentioned to the children of this marriage."

Now, I think too much importance in one point of view cannot be attached to the expression that the security of L.10,000 is to be pro tanto of the provisions to the children of the marriage, because when you come to the sub-dividing of the sum of L.16,000, with which we have afterwards to deal under another clause, the very outside provision, the largest amount of the provision for the children other than the heir is L.10,000. But that sum, under the operation of the words pro tanto, does not exhaust the cumulo provisions for "the children of the marriage." It is only pro tanto: Beyond the L.10,000 nothing could go to a junior member of the family. All beyond that is a provision to the heir of the marriage. That must necessarily be held. So the deed begins. How does it end with reference to this matter? "It is hereby agreed that all execution necessary shall pass upon this contract at the instance of" the trustees "for implement of the provisions above mentioned in favour of the said Jean Mercer and the children to be provided of this marriage. That is, the same provisions with which the deed started. It is for L.10,000 pro tanto of the larger provision, and it is for the larger provision to the whole children of the marriage in so far as the cumulo provision must

No. 235.

July 17, 1857.
Keith's Trustees v. Keith
and Others.

necessarily exceed the sum of L.10,000,—beyond which nothing is given to the children of the marriage other than the heir. There is another passage which implies very much the same thing. That portion of the deed to which I am now referring deals with the event of there being no son of the first marriage, but of a second marriage, and that there shall be vested in him the larger provision of L.16,000, under certain burdens in favour of the daughters of the first marriage: And how is the L.16,000, the larger provision, dealt with? In case the daughters and their descendants shall be excluded from the succession to the foresaid provisions by an heir-male of any subsequent marriage, then certain sub-portions are to be given to the daughters so excluded. The son is to succeed to the L.16,000 in the character of trustee for these provisions. But it is the marriage contract provision to “the children of the marriage” that the deed is dealing with. Accordingly, the clause, which certainly is of a peculiar structure, rests on an obligation of the father to provide and secure upon land, or other security, the sum of L.16,000 sterling, and “in which sum is comprehended and included the foresaid sum of L.10,000.” Now, the L.10,000 was previously declared to be for payment pro tanto of the provisions afterwards mentioned, and of course the meaning of that is, that the L.16,000, in which the L.10,000 is included, is equally to be dealt with as a provision for “the children of this marriage.” That being the case, we have two sets of provisions—first, the general provision for the family of L.16,000, and, second, the smaller provision for the junior branches of the family, and which is to be made a burden upon the party in whom is vested the L.16,000. But that does not exhaust the provisions for “the children of the marriage,” for all that remains after these sub-provisions are carried out of it is as much a portion of the L.16,000 as that sum is a provision which in cumulo for the family is a debt due by the contracting parent, and as a provision for the children of the marriage is as much a provision for the heir of the marriage as for the other members of the family, whose interest is to be carved out of it. In fact, the making the sub-portions to the younger children a burden upon the larger sum is a mere mode of distributing the provisions for the family. But the heir of the marriage is not excluded from the position of a child of the family. As a child of the family he is to have certain rights as creditor under the marriage contract, and the shape in which these provisions are given, although it may be by cumulo investiture in the whole sum for the family, is substantially a trust for the heir and the other children. They are to get what the father has carved out for them, and the heir shall have the remainder.

If the deed had rested there, and we had had nothing to do with the verbal and grammatical criticism I have referred to, it is impossible, when you read the clause —“which portions above mentioned are and shall be in full satisfaction to them of all bairns’ part of gear, legitim,” &c., it is impossible to exclude the heir of the marriage there any more than the rest of the children. “The children of the marriage” are general words, which are all the more important to be considered in that light, because when the interests of the other members of the family are being dealt with, they are distinguished as the “children of the marriage other than the heir;” but when they are not so distinguished, then they embrace the whole children of the marriage.

It was argued, that “in the events foresaid” does not apply to the heir of the marriage. But he is just as much affected by the events which affect the other children as the other children themselves. In the first place, he would be affected as regards what shall remain to him of the L.16,000, by the father’s exercise of the power of distribution, which power might be exercised to the full extent of the L.16,000, only giving to the heir what shall be a bona fide reasonable distribution. In the second place, he is affected by the special clause in the deed, which apportions the subdivisions according to the number of daughters, so that the balance resulting to the heir is just as much affected as the interests of the other children. But there is one position in which the Countess Flahault might have been the heir of the first marriage, and not had right to the L.16,000. If there had been a son of the second marriage, he is specified as the trustee,—as I have called the heir,—for holding the L.16,000. Failing the sons to be procreated of this first marriage, and the heirs of their bodies, the L.16,000 is to be invested in “the sons to be procreated of the body of the said George Keith Elphinstone, of any subsequent marriage, one after another, and to the heirs whatsoever of their bodies.” Now there is a portion of the deed specially applicable to the daughters of this marriage being excluded by a son and heir-male of the second marriage. It gives them certain subdivisions out of the L.16,000. But the heir of the second marriage is not the heir of the first marriage, and if the heir of the second marriage had been the distributor of this L.16,000, every child of the first marriage would have had a provision carved out of it; and so the heir of the marriage, if you can call the eldest daughter "heir," in the sense used in this argument, equally with her sisters, would have taken this provision out of the L.16,000, in this case invested in the heir of the second marriage, and this clause of exclusion of legitim would have applied to every one of them. If she had been one of the three or four children, she would get the sub-portion appointed. If she had stood alone, she would have got the larger subdivision appointed her. But whether a larger or smaller provision, she would have been considered a child of the marriage, and as such her legitim would have been excluded. Now that case has not happened. But it is only by noting it that we arrive at the next position, the case of the eldest daughter of the first marriage, failing a son of the second marriage. In that substitution, does the eldest daughter of the first marriage, failing the heir of the second marriage, take as heir of the second marriage? Not at all. She takes by force of this destination, and distributes the L.16,000 according to the instructions of the deed. It is distributed among the children of the marriage, of whom she is one. If she had been alone she would have taken the L.16,000. But whatever she takes, whether she takes the whole, without the burden, or not, she equally takes as a child of the marriage, and equally comes within the operation of the clause.

No. 235.

July 17, 1857.
Keith's Trustees v. Keith and Others.

An argument was raised as to the meaning of the words "which portions." (After minutely criticising the deed, his Lordship thought that the word was synonymous with provisions). Upon the whole matter, therefore, his Lordship continued, I am clearly of opinion that the legitim of the eldest daughter of the first marriage is just as much excluded as it would have been if there had been a son of the second marriage.

With regard to the Dowager Lady Keith's claim for jus relictæ, and the claim of Mrs Villiers for legitim, I say nothing. The Lord Ordinary has explained the grounds on which these provisions are to be dealt with, and I agree with him and your Lordship in adopting that view. Therefore we come to this shape of things, that if the legitim of the Countess Flahault is excluded, the whole legitim must go to Mrs Villiers, and if the widow takes the jus relictæ, that must be a third of the entire estate.

It is needless, if such be our judgment, to ask what shall be the duty of collation between the two sisters—which the Lord Ordinary has reserved, for the only sister being Mrs Villiers, there is no person to collate with, and nothing to reserve.

With regard to the imputing of the marriage-contract provisions, pro tanto, in satisfaction of the legitim claimed by Mrs Villiers, or the jus relictæ claimed by the Dowager Lady Keith, I see no ground on which it can be maintained. The case of Nisbet, as I understand it, is in the face of every case in the Scotch law before and after it, and there it has lain buried for nearly a hundred years, not affecting a single deed made during that time. But, moreover, it is a judgment incompatible with the principle on which the law of legitim and jus relictæ now rests. Therefore I am quite clear, that so far as the trustees claim this to be imputed, they are not entitled to have that claim allowed.

The next question is;—The Countess Flahault being excluded, and Mrs Villiers entitled to take her own legitim and her mother's jus relictæ,—both she and her mother having had benefits conferred on them by those deeds which operate a universal settlement of Lord Keith's estate,—can they have both? They cannot, and that by force of all recent decisions, some in the House of Lords, and many in this Court. Mrs Villiers cannot take legitim without repudiating the settlement. She cannot keep alive her interest in the settlement without repudiating her legitim; and as the distribution of the estate must be made at the testator's death, she must now,—getting information, no doubt, so as to enable her to deal with all the elements of her option,—make her election between the one or the other. As to her difficulty in knowing how the contingencies under the deed may affect her, that may be said of every contingency. She has information sufficient to enable her to make an election, if she knows that there is such and such a contingency, and is

No. 235.
 —
 July 17, 1857.
 Keith's Trustees v. Keith
 and Others.

informed what is its value. She is not entitled to delay her election until she sees whether she is to be more benefited the one way or the other. She must elect now, and the parties interested are not to be postponed by her.

The only remaining point is in regard to the Thellusson Act. There, too, I have found difficulty, but I cannot agree with the Lord Ordinary. I am not sure whether it was not admitted in argument that the Thellusson Act did not apply to deeds but to accumulations. I am of opinion that the Act does not annul deeds as deeds containing such directions to accumulate. They are not vitiated from that fault. But the Act annuls the directions for accumulations. A deed executed before the passing of this Act containing such a direction to accumulate the Act does not say shall be null. Whether the accumulations had been already made or not, if they were made under a deed executed before the passing of the Act, the directions in the deed would have an end. That is perfectly clear on a reading of the words of the first clause, but, taking along with them section 4, we have a glossary which renders it inevitable to put such a construction on the Act. The words of section 4 are, "That the restrictions in this Act contained, shall take effect and be in force with respect to wills and testaments made and executed before the passing of this Act, in such cases only where the deviser or testator shall be living, and of sound and disposing mind, after twelve calendar months from the passing of this Act."

Now, that clause distinguishes between the different classes of instruments which the first clause dealt with. The first clause dealt with deed or deeds, surrender or surrenders, none of which are wills or testaments. They are other matters altogether, and accordingly follow these words, "will, codicil," &c. Thus the first clause embraces deeds inter vivos already existing, and under which rights are affected. It applies also to deeds mortis causa. Section 4 deals with the last only. It provides that wills and testaments, made before the passing of the Act, shall take effect and be in force only when the testator shall be living within so many months after the passing of the Act. They are testamentary deeds of a kind which have no substantive existence as operative rights in the lifetime of the testator, and, therefore, are dealt with in such a way as that the statute shall reach them if the party lives within a certain time and does not alter them. They were then held equivalent to being executed at the time of his death. Now, that satisfies me that, except as regards testamentary deeds, the first clause must have meant that deeds executed before the date of the Act were not to be affected by the Act. Section 4 satisfies me that testamentary deeds, though existing then, should not be operative against the provisions of the Act only where the party survived a certain time after the statute, because he had power to alter them, and is to be held as having made the deed every moment of his life. The deed is held to be of continuous date, and as only operative at the testator's death.

Now, does the Act of the 11 & 12 Vict. make any change upon the matter in the sense in which I have been dealing with it? It sets forth the Thellusson Act, and provides that it shall apply to Scotland, as it would have applied but for the exception in it, and, therefore, under all the conditions and restrictions as to the deed being a deed executed after the date of the Act. This is an extension of the Act. It takes away the exception. But it does not mean to put the direction for accumulations in Scotland on a different footing from what it was in England. I think that the Lord Ordinary is wrong in so far as, in reference to Scotch heritage, he has held that the power of accumulation is to stop from the date of the Act of Victoria. The deed in question was executed before the repeal of the exception, and there is nothing in the manner of the repeal to give it a retrospective and retroactive effect. As the case stands, the entail cannot be executed until the death of the Countess Flahault. Therefore Mrs Villiers cannot take anything under the directions of the deed. She is not an heir of entail until the very moment when the entail is ordered to be executed. It is not like the case of a trustee being directed to entail from this moment, and where the heir during the period that it is impossible to purchase lands gets the interest of the money. She has no interest or legal right until the time that the trustees are directed to execute the entail, and they are forbidden to execute it until the Countess Flahault dies. The effect of that is, that the accumulated rents (which are now made null by force of statute) belong to nobody. They are intestate, and therefore must go to the two daughters. I entirely agree with the Lord Ordinary upon that point, and also with the concluding clause of his judgment, which is auxiliary to it, that the entail cannot now be executed. No. 235.

That exhausts the whole matter in the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary. The case must be put on the footing that Mrs Villiers must now elect, and we must remit to the Lord Ordinary to take all necessary steps for bringing to that election the necessary information. July 17, 1857.
Keith's Trustees v. Keith and Others.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—I am relieved from the necessity of going into a statement of the facts, as the details have been correctly and lucidly set forth by your Lordship. This is a process of distribution of the estate of a Scotch nobleman, who died domiciled in Scotland in the year 1823, leaving a general trust-settlement omnia bonorum, for the purposes therein set forth. The estate consisted of moveable funds of considerable amount—of heritage in England—and also of heritage in Scotland. The truster directed that the annual proceeds of the residue of all the trust-estate should be accumulated until certain contingencies (which have not yet taken place) should be purified; and that then the lands left by him in Scotland, and other lands to be purchased with the proceeds of the other portions of the trust-estate, and with the yearly accumulations in the meantime of the free yearly proceeds of the estate, should be entailed on the series of heirs therein set forth.

The claimants are four in number—1. The trustees on behalf of the heirs of entail, and others to whom the trust-estate is provided; 2. The truster's widow, the Dowager Lady Keith (now represented by her daughter Mrs Villiers); 3. His eldest daughter (Countess Flahault), by a former marriage; and 4. Mrs Villiers, his daughter by his second marriage. So far as these three last parties cannot establish special claims, the trustees, as general disponees, are entitled to the whole trust-estate, and to entail it in terms of the settlement. But it is maintained by the other claimants, that the directions in the trust-deed are ineffectual—1st, as to the accumulations of the annual income subsequent to the year 1844, being twenty-one years after the truster's death, in virtue of the statute 39 & 40 Geo. III. c. 98, which accumulations are accordingly claimed as intestacy by his daughters as his legal representatives; 2d, as to one-third of his executry claimed by his widow (now by her representative) as jus relictæ; and 3d, as to another third of that executry claimed by his daughters as legitim. We have now to judge whether, or how far, these objections to the settlement, and corresponding claims by the legal representatives, the widow, and the children, of the testator, are well founded?

The first question is, how far the directions as to accumulations are affected by the Thellusson Act?

The objection founded on that Act does not apply to either the heritage or the moveables which were left by the testator at his death, or to the accumulation of the annual proceeds thereof for twenty-one years thereafter. It is urged only as to the accumulations from 1844. And there is no question that the objection is well founded as to the accumulation of the annual proceeds of the heritage in England, and of all the executry. This being the case, what becomes of these accumulations? The answer is, that, as no effectual direction has been made regarding them, they are held for the testator's legal representatives, according to the rules of intestate succession—that is to say, for Countess Flahault and Mrs Villiers. It was pleaded that, under the case of Ogilvie's trustees, and the principle there recognised, the party in whose favour the estate was directed to be invested should now be held to be in the same position as if that investment were now made; and, consequently, that Mrs Villiers, the party in whose favour, as institute, the entail, if it had been executed in 1844, would have been granted, should be preferred to these undisposed of accumulations. The distinction between this case and that of Ogilvie's trustees is this:—In that case the accumulation was directed to take place merely for the purpose of increasing the amount of the fund; and, at the period when the accumulation was to cease, the fund was to be invested. But here that is not the case. The trustees are forbidden to make any investment until the arrival of an event which has not yet taken place; and it is still a matter of uncertainty who will be the institute under the entail when that contingency shall be purified. In the meanwhile, neither Mrs Villiers nor any other person can claim this yearly revenue under the settlement; and, there being no direction at all regarding them to which effect can be given, these fall to the legal representatives, as intestate succession. And, as in taking it they do not contravene any valid or lawful direction of the trust-

No. 235.

July 17, 1857.
Keith's Trustees v. Keith
and Others.

deed, the effect is not to place them in the position of defeating any such direction of the truster; and the plea of approbate and reprobate cannot be maintained against them.

But although this was the case as to the annual proceeds of the executry and of the English heritage subsequent to 1844, the case is different as to the annual proceeds of the Scotch heritage after that date, because the third section of the Act provides "that nothing in this Act contained shall extend to any disposition respecting heritable property in Scotland." Hence the trust-disposition and settlement in question (the settlement being in the form of a disposition, as is requisite in such cases by the law of Scotland) was effectual to convey the annual proceeds of the Scotch heritage, even after 1844, to the trustees for behoof of the heirs of entail. Such was the position of things in 1848, when the 11 & 12 Victoria was passed; and the question arises,—had this enactment the effect of defeating the right which the heirs of entail had previously acquired to these accumulations? It is a fundamental rule in the construction of statutes that they are not to have a retrospective effect, nor deprive parties of rights already acquired and vested in them, unless there are express words to that effect. In this statute there are no words to that effect. As to the yearly income for the period between 1844 and 1848, it was already a fund in the hands of the trustees, and held by them as belonging to the heirs of entail; and the statute cannot be construed as forfeiting their right to this realised fund, and transferring it to the legal representatives of the truster. And as to the yearly income for the period subsequent to 1848, the beneficial right to that income, although it was prospective, had also vested in the heirs of entail; and as there is nothing to lead to the inference that such a vested interest was intended to be defeated, the Act cannot warrantably be construed as having produced this effect. No doubt this Act, in several cases, enables the party in right of an entailed estate for the time to defeat the rights of some subsequent heirs. But in all these cases the power to do so was conferred in explicit terms; and that power, moreover, could be executed only under the authority of this Court, and with the express consent of a certain number of the heirs of entail next in succession. But the granting of such powers to an heir of entail in possession, and subject to such conditions, raises no inference that the legislature intended to create a forfeiture of the rights of all the heirs of entail, without any such authority, or consent, in favour of the legal representatives of the original entailer.

Having thus ascertained how far the amount of the trust-estate is affected by the Thellusson Act, the next inquiry is, how far is it affected by the jus mariti and legitim of the testator's widow and children? These parties are unquestionably entitled to claim these legal provisions, unless it be shewn that their claims are barred by binding transactions. For whatever difference of statement may appear in the record as to the testator's domicile at some early period of his life, all parties are agreed that he died a domiciled Scotchman. Being so, the succession to his estate is regulated by the rules of the law of Scotland; and according to these rules the widow is entitled to the jus relictæ, and the children to legitim, unless it be shewn that they are effectually barred from enforcing their rights.

The trustees object to the widow's claim for jus relictæ, in respect it is barred, as they say, by the testamentary provision made in her favour by the trust-deed itself, and also by the clause in the second contract of marriage of 1808, referred to by your Lordship.

If the Dowager Lady Keith had taken finally the testamentary provision in her favour in the trust-settlement, she and her representatives would have been barred from claiming a part of the trust-fund as her jus relictæ, because by insisting on such a claim she would have defeated, to a certain extent, the general conveyance of the trust-estate for behoof of the heirs of entail, and she could not be allowed so to approbate and reprobate that settlement. But she had the option of taking either her testamentary or her legal provision; and she did nothing to preclude her from exercising that option. She accordingly did exercise it, by claiming her jus relictæ.

There is more difficulty in the question, whether her claim is barred by the condition in her marriage-contract, that her jointure was "in lieu and full bar and satisfaction of the dower or thirds which at the common law or by custom" she might claim from her husband's estates? If the parties had been domiciled in

No. 235.

July 17, 1857.
Keith's Trustees v. Keith
and Others.

Scotland at the date of that contract in 1808, I think there might have been considerable difficulty as to the effect of that clause, because in that case the rights as to which the parties were transacting could not reasonably be held to be any other rights than those which arise to the widow of a domiciled Scotchman by the law of his domicile; and if Scots parties in their contract of marriage provide a conventional provision in lieu and full bar and satisfaction of what they denominate the dower or thirds claimable by the widow at common law, or by custom, I would have difficulty in holding that the right, as to which they so transacted, was anything else than that third of the goods in communion which is claimable as the widow's share of the goods in communion at the common law and by the custom of Scotland; more especially, as in the case supposed, the condition would admit of no other rational meaning, because the parties could not reasonably be held to have been transacting for a discharge of rights arising at the common law, or by the custom, of some other country to which they did not belong. I was impressed with that notion from the first time I read that clause; and as, when the case came before me in the Outer House, I thought the record was not sufficiently explicit on this point, I, on 27th January 1854, appointed the trustees to explain their denial of Lord Keith's domicile in Scotland at the date of the second marriage; and on 22d December 1854 the record was opened, of consent of parties, in order that their explanation might be embodied in it. And according to the record, as it was finally closed, and now stands, the trustees, in the 15th article of their revised condescendence, sect. 4, explicitly aver that Lord Keith was domiciled in England at the date of his second marriage and of this contract in 1808; and also that the daughter of that marriage was born in England in 1809, while both her parents were domiciled in that country. Hence the objection which the trustees are now founding upon this marriage-contract must be dealt with on the footing on which it is thus explicitly stated by themselves. And, on the same grounds on which I might have read what the parties denominated the dower or thirds claimable by the widow by the common law and custom, as being the share of the goods in communion belonging to a widow by the common law and custom of Scotland, if they had been domiciled in Scotland, I now read these words as describing only some right which might belong to a widow by the common law and custom of England, and which could not have reasonably been intended by them to apply to a right arising to widows by the law or custom of Scotland, or any other foreign country to which they did not then belong. Dealing with that as the proper construction of the deed, I can have no doubt that it does not bar the jus relictæ, and on this ground I concur in the result arrived at by your Lordship.

It was argued that a conventional provision in a marriage-contract is to be presumed to have been made in satisfaction of all legal provisions. This is not the rule of the law of Scotland. It is not so at common law, even as to terce; and so the Court held, in the case of Lady Craigleith, 25th January 1681, Mor. p. 6540. But the Court, while they held such to be the common law, remitted this matter (as is stated in the report) for the consideration of Parliament; and it then passed this Act of 1681, cap. 10, which provides that in future such conventional provisions should be held to satisfy the right of terce. Even this statute, however, does not apply to jus relictæ; and as Erskine (3, 9, 16) puts it, that Act confirms what was the rule before as to the jus relictæ, which was held to be ex preposito omitted from the enactment.

Again, as to the claim for legitim, we must distinguish between the cases of Mrs Villiers and of the Countess Flahault.

As to the claim of the former, several questions have been raised. One is, whether the conventional provision in favour of the issue of the second marriage by the contract of 1808 bars her right to legitim? But there is in it no clause that can possibly have this effect. No such condition is expressed. Nor can any such condition be implied in that contract. It cannot be presumed that parties were bargaining as to a right which never could arise under the law of England; in which country, according to the condition of the argument, the contracting parties were domiciled when that contract was entered into by them. Therefore, as to the claim of Mrs Villiers for legitim, there is no doubt that, if she chooses to take her legitim, she must get it.

But she cannot be allowed both to reprobate the testamentary settlement

No. 235.

July 17, 1857.
Keith's Trustees v. Keith
and Others.

by taking her legitim, and so to that extent defeating the general conveyance for behoof of the heirs of entail, and also to approbate it by eventually taking the testamentary provision thereby made in her favour—viz. a life interest as institute or heir of entail, in the event of the death of the Countess of Flahault without heirs-male of her body. She must elect between that testamentary provision and her legal provision of legitim. And she must make that election now. She maintains that she is entitled to take her legitim now; leaving the trustees, in the event of the succession to the entailed estate opening to her in her lifetime, in terms of the settlement to retain the possession of it, in order to indemnify the future heirs, by accumulating for their behoof the yearly income during her lifetime. But she cannot thus escape from the operation of the rule of approbate and reprobate. There would be but little probability that by this means the future heirs of entail would be indemnified for what they would be deprived of, consisting of one-third of all the moveable funds, with twenty-one years' interest thereof from the time of Lord Keith's death. And, at all events, this proposal could not be adopted without contravening the express directions of the settlement as to the time when the entail is to be executed.

The next question as to Mrs Villiers' claim of legitim is, whether, although she is not barred by her conventional provision in the marriage-contract of her parents from claiming legitim, she is not bound to collate the sum she will receive under that provision? Whether or not the plea of collation could be maintained by any other child entitled also to claim legitim, does not require to be considered by us, because we are all of opinion that such is not the state of the present case. And the trustees are not entitled to plead collation; that plea being competent only in a question as to division of legitim among the children themselves, and not being competent to the executors or general representatives of the defunct, to the effect of increasing the dead's part. Upon this point my opinion so entirely coincides with that expressed by your Lordship, that I do not add a word to what you have already said.

The trustees reproduce this argument in a somewhat different form, by maintaining that Mrs Villiers must at least impute what she will receive in virtue of the conventional provision, as satisfying pro tanto the claim of legitim. I do not understand the practical difference between such imputing and collation. Upon that point I entirely concur in what has been stated by Lord Ivory. The legitim consists of an equal half, or a third, as the case may be, of all the free executry, as it exists at the time of the death of the defunct. No father has it in his power to set apart as dead's part more than one-half or one-third, as the case may be, of his free executry. Although the right of children to legitim may be barred or excluded altogether, either by transactions between their father and them, or by an onerous agreement between their parents in an antenuptial marriage-contract, yet, if legitim be still claimable by any one or more of the children, its amount must be always one-third or one-half of the free executry, according as jus relicte is or is not claimable by a widow; and, in short, the amount of the legitim, when it is claimable at all, must always be equal to the amount of the dead's part.

The only remaining question is, whether the legitim belongs wholly to Mrs Villiers, or is divisible between her and the Countess Flahault? And what the solution of this question depends upon is, whether the clause in the contract of marriage between Lord Keith and his first wife,—declaring that the conventional provision therein made in favour of the children of that marriage should be in full satisfaction of their legitim,—applies to the existing case of there being only one child of that marriage. I think that it does; because, in so many words, the parties, whose claim of legitim is so barred, are declared to be the children of the marriage generally, without the exception of any of them; and also because the object of such conditions in marriage-contracts is to fix the amount of what the wife and the issue are to have right to claim from the estate of the husband and father, leaving all the rest at his own disposal. The party, in whose favour the discharge of the legitim is intended to operate, is the father himself, and not any one of the children; and it would be a strange result, if a condition intended to relieve the father's estate from a claim of legitim, should leave his estate still subject to that claim, and merely transfer the right to it to the heir of the marriage. Such a construction cannot be put on such a clause, unless it will not fairly admit of a more reasonable reading. I was prepared to go more fully into this question in consequence of the Lord Ordinary having been of a different opinion; but your Lordship has so entirely anticipated anything I had to say, that I shall simply content myself by expressing my concurrence in your observations.

LORD DEAS.—Although the pecuniary interests of the parties in this case are large, the general principles of law involved in it (apart from the applicability of the Thellusson Act) are familiar to every Scotch lawyer, and it is unnecessary to enlarge upon them. The difficulties which occur arise only upon the special terms of the deeds. The most convenient way of dealing with the findings of the Lord Ordinary is, I think, to take them, as your Lordship in the chair has done, in the order in which they stand in the interlocutor; although, in regard to several of them, very little need be said, especially after the full and lucid exposition of them given in the Lord Ordinary's note.

1. As to homologation, I think it clear there has been none, by any of the parties, to bar their legal rights; and, upon this point, I have not a word to add.

2. The question whether the claim of the Dowager Viscountess Keith to jus relictæ is excluded by the terms of her marriage-contract of 1808, is a question upon which I do not think it necessary to resort to the law of England. The deed was, no doubt, executed in England, where the parties then resided. It is disputed whether Lord Keith was then domiciled there, but I do not consider the fact material, because Lord Keith was admittedly a Scotch nobleman, possessed of Scotch as well as English estates, and it is clear enough, on the face of the contract, that the object of it was to deal with the rights of the contracting parties in both ends of the island, and that they had a view to the law of both countries. When we come, therefore, to consider a complex clause, such as we have here, by which the jus relictæ is said to be excluded, the question whether one part of that clause applies to English rights and the other to Scotch rights, is a question not more fitted for English lawyers than for Scotch lawyers. It is a question we must decide for ourselves, in the Court where it arises; and, if decided in the affirmative, the further question—what is the effect of that part of the clause which deals with Scotch rights upon the Scotch claim of jus relictæ,—is still more clearly a question for our own consideration and decision.

Now, it appears to me, that the first part of this complex clause has no relation to Scotch rights whatever. The language of it is obviously not Scotch law language; and, if it had stood alone, I should have said that we ought to have the opinion of counsel learned in the law of England before judging of the meaning and effect of it. But it does not stand alone. It is followed by the words, "And also in full bar and satisfaction of the terce to which she is or otherwise might be entitled by the law of Scotland." Why here, and not elsewhere, speak of the law of Scotland, if this part of the clause was not alone to regulate the widow's Scotch law rights? And why specify the terce alone, in speaking of her rights by the law of Scotland, if this was not the only Scotch law right which was meant to be excluded?

If, then, the jus relictæ be not excluded either in terminis or by general words (of which I can see none), which plainly cover it, the claim must receive effect, subject to the qualification (which is not seriously objected to) of electing between it and the testamentary provision.

3. The question whether Lady Flahault's legitim is excluded by her father and mother's contract of marriage of 1787 is one attended with more difficulty. I confess that, from the first, I doubted the soundness of the Lord Ordinary's view upon this point, although I admit I was considerably moved by the able argument of the Solicitor-General. That argument was to the effect, that the L.16,000, which was intended to be invested in purchasing land for behoof of the heir, was dealt with throughout as if it formed already a landed estate to be burdened with the portions of the younger children,—that the clauses which refer to the L.10,000, as to be held for security and payment of the widow's annuity, "and afterwards for security and payment pro tanto of the provisions after mentioned to the children of this marriage," do not (as was assumed on the other side) mean in security and payment of the provisions of the widow and of the whole children, including the heir, but only in security and payment of the widow's annuity (which corresponded to that capital), and of the provisions to the younger children,—that, consequently, the

No. 235.

July 17, 1857.
Keith's Trustees v. Keith and Others.

No. 235.

July 17, 1857.
Keith's Trustees v. Keith
and Others.

clause in dispute, which excludes the legitim, is not the only clause in which mention is made, in general terms, of the portions or provisions of the children of the marriage without meaning to include the heir, and therefore that the clause in dispute connects naturally, according to the structure of the deed, with the previous clause relative to the portions or provisions of the younger children only, and which were to form burdens upon the provision of the heir.

But the strength or weakness of this argument, obviously, depends much upon whether, in the previous part of the deed, the L10,000 be really spoken of as pro tanto for security and payment of the widow and younger children only, or likewise of the heir. Now, it appears to me that the L.10,000 is spoken of as for security and payment of the provisions, not merely of the widow and younger children, but of the whole children of the marriage. Suppose no further sum had ever been set aside or made forthcoming, and that Lord Keith had executed no further deed relative to the younger children's provisions, which, in that case, could, at the utmost, not have exceeded L.6000, would the balance not have gone to the heir in security and payment pro tanto of the L.16,000 provision? Most clearly it would. And if this be so, then, until we come to the clause in dispute, the provisions to the children of the marriage are never spoken of, throughout the deed, without the addition of the words "other than the heir," except as meaning the provisions of the whole children of the marriage, including the heir.

The excluding words used in the clause in dispute, if taken by themselves, are plainly calculated to include the heir as well as the other children. This throws upon the heir the burden of showing that the words are used in a sense different from that which, in themselves, they naturally bear. This cannot be done by saying they are used in a similar restricted sense in other parts of the deed, for of that, if I am right in the remark just made, there is no instance. On the contrary, we have the same words used (twice over) in a previous part of the deed, where they plainly comprehend the heir. It follows that in that previous part of the deed the word "provisions" is used as comprehending the L.16,000 provided to the heir; and although it is subsequently stipulated that the L.16,000 is to be burdened with the widow's provisions, and with suitable "portions and provisions" to the children of the marriage, other than the heir succeeding to the L.16,000, the words "which provisions" are immediately afterwards used as descriptive of what had thus been called "portions and provisions," in a way which shows clearly that the writer understood these words to be synonymous. The word "portions" in this clause, therefore, could not form an antecedent to the word "portions" in the clause in dispute, in any other sense than as being synonymous with provisions. Nor can any other construction be gathered from the clause immediately preceding the clause in dispute; for there the word "portions" is used only with reference to the portions of the daughters of the marriage, and the words "the said portions" refer back to the words "which provisions," in the very same sentence, as being words of synonymous import. Then, as to the remark that the clause in dispute refers to portions provided to the children "in the respective events before specified," it is obvious that the portion of the heir of the marriage fluctuates according to events as much as the portions of any of the other children; and, indeed, in one event, viz, that of there being only daughters or a daughter of the marriage, and a son of a subsequent marriage, the heir of the marriage was not to take the L.16,000 provision at all. Had that event occurred, there could have been no doubt that the legitim of all the children of the marriage would have been excluded, so that what must be contended for is not that the word "children," in the clause in dispute, is to be read as "younger children," but that we are to read the clause as if it bore, after the words "which portions above mentioned, provided to the children of this marriage," the further words, "other than the heir succeeding as aforesaid." I see no authority, whatever, for inserting these latter words, which the makers of the deed did not insert for themselves. Without them the clause expressly excludes the legitim of every one of the children of the marriage in the event which has happened, as well as in the other events contemplated by the deed; and the clause must therefore receive effect.

4 and 5. The next two findings do not require, from me, any additional remark. With reference to the fifth finding, I agree with your Lordships, that Mrs Villiers must make her election, and that she must make it now.

6. The sixth finding, in so far as it holds the Thellusson Act applicable to the accumulated rents of the Scotch heritable estates, raises a question of novelty and importance. It appeared to me, at an early period of the discussion, that the Lord Ordinary had arrived at a somewhat startling result, even upon a statute dealing freely, as the Rutherford Act does, with vested interests; and, although I have not been unmoved by the argument, I am satisfied, upon full consideration, that that result is not warranted by the terms of these statutes.

No. 235.

July 17, 1857.
Keith's Trustees v. Keith and Others.

It is necessary, in the outset, to see precisely what was done by the Thellusson Act. That Act proceeds upon the preamble that "it is expedient that all dispositions of real or personal estates, whereby the profits and produce thereof are directed to be accumulated, and the beneficial enjoyment thereof is postponed, should be made subject to the restrictions hereinafter contained." Then comes the enacting clause:—"That no person or persons shall, after the passing of this Act, by any deed or deeds, will, codicil, or otherwise howsoever, settle or dispose of any real or personal property, so, and in such manner that the rents," &c., thereof shall be accumulated beyond the periods therein mentioned. The word "dispositions" is thus used in the preamble as a general term, comprehending the various deeds and writings specified in the enacting clause. Shortly, therefore, we may express the substance of the enactment by saying that it strikes against all dispositions of real or personal property made after its date, in so far as these may direct accumulations contrary to the provisions of the Act. The exception in section 3 is in corresponding terms:—"Provided also, and be it enacted, that nothing in this Act contained shall extend to any disposition respecting heritable property within that part of Great Britain called Scotland."

Had the Act stopped here, I am not prepared to say that any disposition executed and completed prior to the passing of the Act, would have fallen within its operation. At all events, I am not aware that the Act has been construed as applicable to every disposition, although in operation for many years, or (it might be) for centuries previously. That construction, no doubt, would be conclusive of the present case. But it is not countenanced by section 4 of the Act. That section applies not to all dispositions, but only to a certain class of what the Act treats as dispositions, namely, "wills and testaments made and executed before the passing of this Act;" and it enacts that the restrictions of the Act shall apply to these "in such cases only where the deviser or testator shall be living, and of sound and disposing mind after the expiration of twelve calendar months from the passing of this Act." If wills and testaments made by persons then living were to stand good, although directing accumulation contrary to the Act, unless the makers remained alive and of sound mind for twelve months after the Act, it would be a strong thing to suppose that dispositions which the makers had no power to alter, and which had already taken effect, were to be struck at by the Act. The object of section 4 obviously, I think, was to apply the restrictions of the Act to those dispositions—namely, wills and testaments—which were still within the power of the makers, if, after full time and opportunity, the makers did not choose to alter them.

If this be a sound view of the Thellusson Act, it follows that the Rutherford Act, if it reaches Lord Keith's directions as to his heritable estates in Scotland, does much more than wipe away, from and after the passing of the Rutherford Act, the exception contained in section 3 of the Thellusson Act. But are there sufficient grounds for holding that it does more? I cannot discover that there are. The Rutherford Act narrates the 3d section of the Thellusson Act,—repeals that section,—and enacts that the Thellusson Act shall, in future, apply to heritable property in Scotland. If the enacting words had been, shall, in future, apply to dispositions of heritable property in Scotland, I cannot see that there could have been room for doubt about the matter. But I do not think that, by repealing the exception, and saying shortly that the Act shall, in future, apply to heritable property in Scotland, there was meant anything different than if the full phraseology of the excepting clause repealed had been adopted by saying that the Act shall, in future, apply to dispositions respecting heritable property in Scotland.

A construction which strikes against vested interests is not readily to be adopted in preference to one which saves them, and certainly not if this last be the natural construction, which I think it is here. Indeed, if the other construction were adopted, I think the consistent result would be, that the Rutherford Act would apply, whether

No. 235.
 July 17, 1857.
 Keith's Trustees v. Keith
 and Others.

the disposition had been made and executed before or after the passing of the Thelluson Act, and that the accumulation would be struck at from and after the lapse of the period prescribed by that Act, reckoning from the death of the granter, and not merely from and after the passing of the Rutherford Act. But the Lord Ordinary does not propose to carry his construction that length, and the view he takes is one which, I think, cannot be supported.

7 and 8. The remaining two findings do not require, from me, any observations; and, upon the whole, I concur in the views expressed by your Lordships, which will be best carried into effect by recalling and remodelling the interlocutor, although, with the exceptions which have been noticed, the judgment will be substantially an adherence.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary: And, 1st, Find that the claim in respect of legitim on the part of the Baroness Keith and Nairne, Countess Flahault, is excluded by the terms of the antenuptial contract between her parents in 1787: Repel the same accordingly, and decern: 2d, Find that the claim in respect of legitim on the part of the Honourable Mrs Villiers is not excluded by the terms of the antenuptial contract between her parents in 1808, but that the said claim is incompatible with the terms and provisions of the trust-disposition and settlement of Lord Keith and of his relative English will and deed of conveyance, which deeds constitute an universal settlement of his Lordship's whole heritable and moveable estate; and therefore, that the said Mrs Villiers must now elect between her legal provision of legitim and the testamentary provisions made and created in her favour under the said universal settlement, she being first enabled to do so advisedly by receiving from the trustees of Lord Keith all due and necessary information, in so far as not already given, and within their power to give: 3d, Find that the claim in respect of jus relictæ originally made on the part of the late Dowager Viscountess Keith, and now insisted in by her daughter the said Mrs Villiers, as in her right, is not excluded by the terms of the foresaid antenuptial contract 1808, but that the said claim is incompatible with the terms and provisions of the foresaid universal settlement of Lord Keith's whole heritable and moveable estate, and therefore, that the said Mrs Villiers, as in right of her said mother, must now elect between the said legal provision of jus relictæ and the testamentary provision in her mother's favour made and created under the said universal settlement, she first receiving all due and necessary information as said is from the trustees, in order that she may be enabled advisedly so to do: 4th, Find that the said Mrs Villiers, both as regards her own claim of legitim and as regards her mother's said claim of jus relictæ, is not barred by homologation or otherwise, whether on her own part or on the part of her said mother, from now insisting on her right to elect as said is, or from making good the said claims, or either of them, if she shall elect to take the same; but find that, in the event of her electing to take the jus relictæ, she must repeat and pay back the amount of the testamentary provisions made and created in favour of her mother under the universal settlement, in so far as the same has been already received: And farther, find as to both of said claims, that neither of them in the event of Mrs Villiers electing to take the same, is to be reduced in amount by imputing thereto any part of the sums provided in the contract of marriage 1808, whether to the said Mrs Villiers or her late mother, but that the said sums, in so far as not already satisfied, must form a deduction from the free moveable estate left by Lord Keith: 5th, Find that in the event of the said Mrs Villiers electing to repudiate her legitim and to abide by the testamentary provisions in her favour under the universal settlement aforesaid, the trustees of Lord Keith are not at present, and so long as the said Baroness Keith and Nairne Countess Flahault shall be in life, will not be either entitled or bound to execute an entail in favour of the said Mrs Villiers: 6th, Find that the directions in Lord Keith's trust-deed for accumulating the rents, profits, and issues of his estate, in so far as it consisted of heritable property in England, or of moveable property wherever situated, are null and void under the Thellusson Act, the 39 & 40 Geo. III. c. 98, from and after the period of twenty-one years from the death of Lord Keith, who died in March 1823: But find that the said directions for accumulating the rents, profits, and issues of the heritable estate in Scotland are not affected by anything contained either in the said Thellusson Act or in the 41st section of the Act 11 & 12 Victoria, c. 36, but remain in the same full force which they possessed when the foresaid trust-deed first came into operation, and find that in so far as the directions to accumulate have been found null and void in manner now set forth, the accumulations made under and in respect of the same belong, and in respect of the matters found under the fifth head hereof will, down to the period when the trustees shall be entitled and bound to execute the said entail, continue to belong to the said Baroness Keith and Nairne Countess Flahault, and to the said Mrs Villiers, equally between them, as the parties in the absence of said entail entitled to succeed thereto ab intestato: with these findings, Remit the cause to the Lord Ordinary to be farther proceeded in as accords, and especially that his Lordship may take such steps as may be required for ascertaining quam primum to what effect the said Mrs Villiers elects between the legal and testamentary provisions, and this whether in her own right or in that of her mother."

No. 225.
July 17, 1857.
Steuart v.
Johnston.

J. S. JOHNSTON, S.S.C.—DUNDAS & WILSON, C.S.—RUSSELL & NICOLSON, C.S.—Agents.

No. 236.

ROBERT STEUART, Pursuer.—E. S. Gordon—Broun.

WILLIAM JOHNSTON (Dixon's Trustee), Defender.—D. F. Inglis—Patton.

Superior and vassal—Terms of feu contract.—A agreed to feu to B part of his land, under reservation of minerals;—Held (aff. judgment of Lord Ardmillan) that, in the feu disposition, A was not bound to insert a clause of obligation to support the roof in the event of his working the minerals, nor to pay damages in the event of his failure so to support it.

Agent and Principal—Feu Contract—Relevancy.—A averred that an agreement of feu had been concluded between him and B, or those acting for B, with whom A treated in regard to various matters in which B was concerned, with B's full cognisance and sanction, but he did not aver or produce any contract with B, or written authority by him to contract for said feu, nor did he aver that B had adopted the proceedings of those alleged to have been acting for him;—Held (aff. judgment of Lord Ardmillan) that there was no relevant allegation of authority given to any one to enter into a feu contract on B's behalf.

Proof—Parole Evidence.—Question, Whether an averment of verbal authority to contract for a feu can be competently proved by parole?

July 17, 1857.

MR DIXON purchased part of Mr Steuart's property of Carfin, for the purpose of working the coal and other minerals on the property so acquired by him. Thereafter, Mr Dixon applied for a feu of part of Mr Steuart's ad-

1st Division.
Ld. Ardmillan
C.

No. 236. joining property, which was granted, under reservation of the minerals—a condition inserted in all Mr Steuart's feus. Mr Steuart now averred that
 July 17, 1857. Steuart v. Johnston. "Mr Dixon, or those acting for him, subsequently signified his wish to obtain another feu, and to this the pursuer also agreed on the same terms;" and that "although no regular feu-contract with regard to either of the feus was entered into, both transactions were legally constituted by the written communications and other actings of the parties;" that the defender having been appointed Mr Dixon's trustee, and, as such, infeft in the property purchased by Mr Dixon, objected to receive the first feu, without an obligation by Mr Steuart to pay any loss or damage which Mr Dixon might sustain by reason of the pursuer's coal workings, and that he repudiated the second feu altogether, as having been entered into without Mr Dixon's authority. The pursuer therefore brought this action against the trustee, to compel him to implement these feuing agreements, and to accept a feu-tack of each of the feus, under the conditions and reservations "originally understood and agreed on between the said parties, and being the same as those in the other feu rights granted by the pursuer," or alternatively concluding for L.500 of damages. And concluding also for payment "of L.70 sterling in respect of surface damage caused by the formation of the accommodation line of railway hereinafter condescended on through the pursuer's farms," and the farther sum of L.20 sterling per annum in time coming, or such other sum, for the time past and future, as shall be found by Neil Robson, Esq., civil engineer, to be the just compensation and damages due to the pursuer in consequence of the formation of the railway, and also to compel implement of the defender's obligations to fence the railway, or alternatively for damages for non-implement, and also for payment of L.116, 2s. 7½d., "being the annual feu-duties outstanding upon the first and second feus above-mentioned," &c.

The pursuer farther stated that he had arranged the first feu with Mr Dixon himself, under the usual reservation, and without the qualifications contended for by the trustee; and, with regard to the second feu, that he was "specially introduced and referred to Mr Marshall as Mr Dixon's manager, but in his absence Mr Marshall, with the full authority of Mr Dixon, left an assistant superintendent at Carfin to take charge of the various important matters there, both agricultural and mineral, requiring attention. The first resident superintendent was Mr Stenhouse, who was soon succeeded by Mr Hopper, to both of whom the pursuer was introduced and referred by Mr Dixon and Mr Marshall, and with both of whom, as well as with Mr Marshall himself, he accordingly treated with the full cognisance and sanction of Mr Dixon in reference to various matters in which Mr Dixon was concerned." He then detailed the communications, written and oral, that passed between him and Hopper as concluding an agreement. He averred that serious loss and damage had arisen from non-implement of the feuing agreements, and he therefore pleaded that the defender was bound to implement them, and to accept a feu disposition in regard to the first feu without any qualification. "Mr Dixon having induced the pursuer to believe Mr Marshall and Mr Hopper legally empowered to act in the matters in question, the defender, as his trustee, was barred from objecting to their authority, and more particularly since the pursuer acted on the faith of such authority, and matters were no longer entire." He also pleaded, that, Mr Dixon having admittedly taken and used the pursuer's ground for a railway, he was entitled to have the surface damages ascertained by a judicial remit.

The defender pleaded in regard to the feu No. 1, that he was entitled to receive a feu disposition which should not invert his common law right as proprietor of the surface to insist upon the owner of the underground strata supporting the buildings on the surface, or his paying damages in event of his failure to support them, and that Mr Dixon entered into the transaction on the assumed obligation of the pursuer to do so. Further, that Mr Dixon gave no authority for entering into the second feu contract, and that the question as to surface damages was already the subject of arbitration.

No. 236.

July 17, 1857.
Steuart v.
Johnston.

The Lord Ordinary, on 12th June 1855, pronounced the following interlocutor : — “ Finds — 1st, That the defender, as trustee for Mr Dixon, is entitled to receive, and bound to accept, a feu-disposition of the piece of ground referred to as feu No. 1. 2d, Finds that the defender is not entitled to compel the pursuer to insert in the feu-disposition a special clause of obligation in regard to the working of the reserved minerals, and the liability for damages ; but that the disposition should be in the same terms as the other feu-rights granted by the pursuer in the immediate neighbourhood, where the working of minerals is reserved ; but, in respect that the pleas of the defender and Mr Dixon at common law might be injuriously affected by the exclusion of the proposed clause, after its insertion has been demanded, Finds, specially, that the same is without prejudice to the defender’s said pleas at common law, and under reservation thereof, and of the pursuer’s answers thereto. 3d, Finds, with reference to feu No. 2, that no contract or agreement by Mr Dixon has been produced or alleged ; that no special written authority by Mr Dixon to Marshall and Hopper, or either of them, to contract for such feu, has been produced or alleged ; that no written factory to Marshall and Hopper, or either of them, has been produced ; and that a power to enter into contracts of feu is not implied in the position occupied by Marshall and Hopper, or either of them, or in their relation to Mr Dixon : Finds that it is not relevantly alleged by the pursuer that Mr Dixon, by any act of his, recognised or adopted the proceedings of Marshall and Hopper, or either of them, in regard to feu No. 2 : Finds, in point of law, that an averment of verbal authority to contract for a feu of heritable subjects cannot be competently proved by parole, in the absence of any real evidence, arising from the acts of Mr Dixon importing recognition and adoption of the contract : Therefore assoilzies the defender from the conclusions of this action, in so far as the same relate to feu No. 2. 4th, Finds, that in so far as this action relates to the pursuer’s claim for damage done by the accommodation railway, it has been unnecessarily instituted, in respect that such question of damages falls to be settled by arbitration, in terms of the agreement of parties to refer the same to Mr Robson, civil engineer : Therefore, to that extent and effect, dismisses this action, without prejudice to the pleas of parties, and decerns : Finds the pursuer liable to the defender in expenses ; allows an account thereof to be given in,” &c. *

* “ NOTE.—The question in regard to feu No. 2 has been strenuously and ably argued for the pursuer. No rei interventus, no act of adoption by Mr Dixon, has been alleged. The position of Marshall and Hopper was not one from which a power to enter into a feu-contract could be inferred. Neither of them was a factor, with the large discretion implied in that relation ; and Mr Dixon himself has personally interposed in reference to feu No. 1, while his personal interposition in regard to feu No. 2 is not relevantly alleged. A mandate to a person in the position of Marshall and Hopper to enter into a feu-contract, cannot be proved by parole testimony in an action for constitution or for implement of the obligation. The cases in Baron Hume (Corbett, 5th March 1808, Hume, 346 ; Boswell, 9th March 1811, Hume, 350 ; and the case of Mudie v. Ochterlonie, 13th June 1766, 12,403,) relate to a different question. These were not actions for the constitution of the contract, but merely actions for proof of authority, proceeding on the assumption that the proof was complete. The one was an action against a mandatory who had entered into a contract contra fidem mandati, brought by the mandant, who alleged the breach of faith. The other was an action by the heir of a purchaser, on the ground that a purchase of heritable property had been made for himself ; and the defence was, that Mr Walker, the purchaser at a judicial sale, was the confidential agent of Colonel Fullarton, and bought for his behoof. The

No. 236 The pursuer reclaimed. At advising,—

July 17, 1857.
Steuart v.
Johnston.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am of opinion that there is not here sufficient averment of authority by Dixon to Marshall or Hopper to enter into this contract. Therefore the demand for arrears of feu-duty can only apply to the first feu; and as to that, I see no reason why we should not give decree. There may be a question, however, as to the amount.

As to the rest of the case, it is contended that, having already been made the subject of reference, it should not have been made the subject of this action, and the Lord Ordinary has pronounced the fourth finding in regard to that. I do not think that the action is unnecessary, looking to the contention between the parties; but I think that the proper way of dealing with the matter would be to remit it to Mr Robson, civil engineer. Expenses had better be reserved until these points are disposed of.

LORD IVORY.—I agree. My only hesitation is in regard to the reservation of the defender's pleas at common law. The action is so brought, that I think the whole case ought to be decided; and I would be better satisfied without that reservation.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—I concur.

LORD DEAS.—I do not wish to be understood as assenting to the finding in the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, "that an averment of verbal authority to contract for a feu of heritable subjects, cannot be competently proved by parole." Had the writings founded on instructed a concluded bargain between Marshall and Hopper, or either of them, on the one hand, and the pursuer, on the other, as to the feu No. 2, and had the written evidence of such bargain been coupled with a distinct averment that it was entered into by the defender's authority and for his behoof, I am not prepared to say that such authority might not have been proved by a reference to the defender's oath, or even by the testimony of witnesses. But what I go upon is, that, in the first place, the writings do not prove any concluded bargain, as to this second feu, between Marshall and Hopper, or either of them, and the pursuer; and, in the next place, that there is no distinct or substantive averment of authority by the defender to these parties, or either of them, to enter into such a bargain for his behoof, or anything equivalent to such authority. Just suppose that the pursuer had refused to grant the second feu, and that the defender had attempted to compel him, where was the concluded contract under which he could have done so? I can see none. But both parties must have been bound, or both free. The interlocutor, although substantially right, had better be remodelled.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Adhere to the first two findings in the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary reclaimed against: Recall in hoc statu the finding in that interlocutor as to subsequent conduct of Mr Walker and of Colonel Fullarton afforded real and presumptive evidence, which satisfied the Court, that the defence was well founded, and it was sustained accordingly. In both of these cases, the Act 1696, cap. 25, was relied on, as excluding proof by parole; and, certainly, a stricter view of the Act was taken in the case of Diggan v. Wight, March 2, 1797, M., 12,761, affirmed in the House of Lords 24th November 1797. The present case is one of a very different character. Here there is no question of trust. Here is no real evidence whatever, and no presumptive evidence, arising from the subsequent conduct of Mr Dixon, from which adoption of this contract can be inferred. There is no authority in the institutional writers, and no decision has been referred to by the pursuer, to support the proposition that an authority to the manager of mineral works to enter into a feu-contract of land can be proved by parole evidence. Had there been correspondence on the part of Mr Dixon, which might be susceptible of explanation by the proof of relative facts and circumstances, or had there been any act, in relation to this feu, which, when explained by a proof of facts and circumstances, might import adoption of the contract, a different question would arise; but looking to the averments of the defender on record, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that it would be contrary to principle, and without the sanction of any decision or authority, to admit a proof by parole in this case."

expenses, and quoad ultra recall the said interlocutor: Find that the pursuer has neither instructed nor relevantly averred any binding and concluded agreement with the defender, or any one authorised by him, to purchase or feu the ground referred to in the record and relative plan as to the feu No. 2; Therefore assoilzie the defender from the conclusions of the action, so far as regards this last mentioned feu, and decern: Find that the pursuer is entitled to decree against the defender for payment of the arrears of feu-duty of the feu referred to as No. 1, with legal interest thereon; and remit to Neil Robson, Esq., civil-engineer, to examine the original missive letters of sale and acceptance referred to in the closed record, and to inspect the accommodation line of railway therein mentioned through the pursuer's farms of Hillhead and Hattonhill of Carfin, and to report what, if any, surface damages have been caused to the pursuer, by or through the formation of the foresaid accommodation line of railway, and what redress the pursuer is entitled to receive by the erection of fences, by pecuniary compensation or otherwise thereanent—such report to be given in to the Lord Ordinary: Remit the cause to the Lord Ordinary to proceed therein as shall be just, and reserve all questions of expenses.”

No. 236.

July 17, 1857.
Lockhart v.
Ross.

THOMAS SPROT, W.S.—WALKER & MELVILLE, W.S.—Agents.

DAME EMILIA OLIVIA MACDONALD LOCKHART AND OTHERS, Petitioners.— No. 237.

Sol.-Gen. Maitland—A. B. Shand.

SIR CHARLES W. A. ROSS, Bart., Respondent.—D. F. Inglis—Penney—Young.

Judicial Factor—Lunatic—Appointment of curator bonis—Cognition.—Along with answers to a petition which had been presented, with concurrence of the nearest male agnate, for the appointment of a curator bonis to a person alleged to be insane, medical certificates of his sanity were produced. The application was refused. Question, Whether, where the nearest male agnate is a petitioner, cognition be not the proper mode of proceeding?

THIS was a petition for the appointment of a curator bonis to Sir Charles Ross of Balnagown, Bart. It was stated that Sir Charles had been for some time suffering from mental derangement, and was unable to manage his own affairs; and, in support of that allegation, there were produced certificates from two medical men, who had attended him during the winter of 1856–57, up to March 1857. It was also stated that the rental of his estates exceeded L.9000; that they had been for some time under the management of two commissioners appointed by Sir Charles, who declined to continue to do so, being advised that they were not in safety to do so; and that many important matters connected with the management were pressing. The petition was presented at the instance of Lady Lockhart, Sir Charles's eldest daughter, the heir entitled to succeed to his estate of Bonnington; and the hon. Augustus H. Moreton of Largie, as administrator-in-law for his children, who were all under age, and whose eldest son was entitled to succeed to the estate of Bonnington, with concurrence of James Archibald, Esq. of Invercauld, the nearest male agnate to Sir Charles, and heir next in succession under the entail of Balnagown.

July 17, 1857.
2^d DIVISION.
R.

Answers were given in for Sir Charles, stated to be with the approbation of two of his sisters, residing with him at Balnagown. It was denied that Sir Charles was insane, or unfit to manage his affairs, and certificates were produced to that effect from three medical men who saw him on 15th June 1857. In support of the petition it was argued;—There was no doubt of the incompetency of the appointment sought. It was alleged that Sir Charles's

No. 237. state of mind was such that his property might be injured. Lady Lockhart, the sister of Sir Charles, was not in a position to sue in a process of cognition, and the appointment sought would not affix on him the character of insanity, nor affect the custody of his person. To refuse this application would have the effect of leaving the estates without that protection which the Court was in use to extend to the property of persons unable to act for themselves.¹

July 17, 1857.
Steuart v.
Duke of Argyle.

The respondent did not dispute the power of the Court to make such appointments; but their jurisdiction was consuetudinary, and merely founded on the principle, that the power to prevent injury to the estates of parties unable to manage their own affairs, was inherent in the Court until they could be cognosced. Here the allegation of insanity was denied, and evidence produced in support of that denial. In such circumstances the respondent was entitled to have the question of his sanity tried by a jury, and the concurring petitioner had a right to bring a process of cognition.²

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—If the Court had intended to proceed in this application, it would have been necessary to inquire further, there being conflicting medical certificates as to the sanity of Sir Charles Ross; but it is enough for me that Mr Farquharson of Invercauld, one of the petitioners, is entitled to cognosce; and I am of opinion that this petition must be refused.

LORD MURRAY and LORD WOOD concurred.

LORD COWAN.—I am also of opinion that this petition should be refused. I go very much upon the medical certificates produced, with the answers, being certificates of Sir Charles's state at a period of more than two months after the date at which he appears to have been last seen by the medical men who granted the certificates founded on by the petitioners. I make this observation merely to save myself from being supposed to express an opinion that cognition was the only remedy in the power of the petitioners, supposing their allegations to be well founded.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I do not wish to be understood as saying that cognition was the only remedy. I merely stated that it was enough for me that one of the petitioners was entitled to cognosce.

THE COURT refused the petition.

MELVILLE & LINDSAY, W.S.—MACLAUCHLAN & IVORY, W.S.—Agents.

No. 238.

ALEXANDER STEUART, Pursuer.—Moir—Millar.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLE, Defender.—G. Graham Bell—E. S. Gordon.

Lease.—A canal was formed by the tenant of a coalwork through the grounds of a neighbouring proprietor to whom rent was paid for the ground so occupied. The lease having come to an end, the proprietor of the coalwork possessed the canal and paid rent until decerned to remove and found liable for violent profits in an action which did not conclude for decerniture to have the ground levelled or left in an arable condition. After this decree the proprietor of the coalwork and his successor continued to occupy the canal for several years, and paid as rent the sum fixed as due for violent profits—Held, that he was not bound on ceding possession to level the ground or make it fit for agricultural purposes.

July 17, 1857.

M'DOWALL, the tenant of coalworks belonging to the Duke of Argyle, made a canal for the conveyance of coal through the lands of Moy and Drumore,

2D DIVISION.
Ld. Benholme.

¹ Dewar v. Dewar, 21st Jan. 1834, 12 S. & D. p. 315; Macfarlane v. Macfarlane, 18th Dec. 1846, ante, vol. ix. p. 306; Speirs, 12th Nov. 1851, ante, vol. xiv. p. 11; Act of Sederunt, 13th Feb. 1730.

² Stat. 12 & 13 Vict. c. 51; Act of Sederunt, 13th Feb. 1730; Gordon v. Scott, 2d March 1784, unreported (see Arniston Coll. of Session Papers in Advocates' Library, vol. 175, No. 26).

No. 238.

July 17, 1857.

Steuart v.
Duke of
Argyle.

with the consent of the proprietors of these lands, he undertaking to remunerate them for the yearly damage done to their property, which was fixed by arbiters at L.4, 10s. sterling per annum, and to compensate the possessors of moss rooms through which the canal was taken for their loss. On the expiry of M'Dowall's lease in 1797, his representatives received from the Duke, L.1615 as the value of the canal, and the Duke and his tenants of the coal-work continued to use the canal and to make the yearly payments for the land in the same way as M'Dowall had done. In 1833, Campbell of Glensaddell, the then proprietor of Moy and Drumore, brought an action of removing under the Act of sederunt, 1756, against the late Duke of Argyle and his trustee as pretended tenants of that portion of the lands of Moy and Drumore occupied by the canal. It was pleaded in defence, that the Duke possessed the solum of the canal by a right of property, or at least of servitude, and not of tenancy. This action was dismissed as incompetent by the Sheriff; the pursuer advocated, and at the same time raised an action of declarator, and for violent profits. The summons contained no conclusion to have the Duke ordained to fill up or level the canal, or to render the ground occupied by it fit for agricultural purposes. On 17th June 1836, the Court pronounced an interlocutor by which it was declared that the portion of the lands of Moy occupied by the canal belonged to Campbell of Glensaddell; the defender was ordained immediately to cede possession, and found liable in violent profits from the term of Whitsunday 1834, being fixed at the sum of L.20 sterling per annum. The Duke and his successors continued in the possession of the canal, and paid the proprietor of Moy and Drumore rent at the rate of L.20 per annum. Previous to Whitsunday 1856, the chamberlain of the Duke intimated to Mr Steuart, the present proprietor of Moy and Drumore, that the water would be drawn off the canal, and possession of the ground used for it would be ceded to the proprietor, on whose part intimation was given to the Duke that it was incumbent on his Grace to fill up the bed of the canal, level the banks, and perform any operations that were necessary to restore the ground to its previous condition or render it arable; and this action was raised, concluding for declarator that on ceding possession he was bound to do so. It was stated that the canal was partly filled with stagnant water, and left in such a condition as to be entirely useless as a canal, and unfit for any agricultural or other use without considerable outlay; and it was pleaded that M'Dowall was under an obligation at common law, on ceding possession, to restore the ground which had been used as a canal, which obligation had become incumbent on the Duke of Argyle on his acquiring possession of the canal, and was still binding on his successors, the damage having been occasioned not by the ordinary use of the ground, but by its use for the formation of a canal.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Assoilzies the defender from the conclusions of the action, and decerns: Finds the defender entitled to expenses; allows an account," &c. *

* "NOTE.—The Lord Ordinary cannot find any distinct or solid ground for sustaining the defender in the conclusions of this action. The pursuer pleads upon implied contract; but it is difficult to see how such implied contract should subsist between the pursuer, who, as proprietor of Moy, is a singular successor of the proprietor of that estate, at the time when the coal canal was formed, and the defender, who is not alleged to be the representative of Charles M'Dowall, who made the canal. The circumstances under which the canal was originally made, by the general concurrence of the proprietors and tenants interested, suggest great doubt as to the supposed obligation even of M'Dowall to do what is now required by the pursuer of the defender. But further, it appears that, by the judicial proceedings of a succeeding proprietor of Moy, and decree of declarator and removing taken against the then Duke of Argyle, all contract or implied contract between their pre-

No. 238. The pursuer reclaimed. After hearing parties,—

July 17, 1857.
Steuart v.
Duke of Argyle.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I do not think it necessary to notice all the grounds on which the Lord Ordinary's judgment is founded. It is enough for me that an action of removing was raised by the former proprietor of the lands of Moy and Drumore in which decree was pronounced. By that decree the possession by the defender's predecessors under the original lease was put an end to. The pursuer in that action did not conclude that the defender should be decerned to fill up the canal, and there was no decerniture further than that the defender should remove and pay what was found due for violent profits. If the then Duke of Argyle ceded possession, that decree was implemented. After that decree the Duke continued to possess, but upon a different lease; he paid, no doubt, as rent the sum which had been fixed as due for violent profits, but that does not matter. I cannot get over the decree. I take the case as it stands. The Duke has had possession, and for that possession of the canal he has paid this full rent, and I do not see that his successors are bound to alter the nature of the subject they have so occupied.

LORD MURRAY concurred. The pursuer, or the then proprietor of Moy and Drumore, dissolved every connection between the defender's predecessor and these lands, without concluding that the latter should be decerned to restore them to their former condition. The then Duke of Argyle might in 1836 have removed without restoring them, and I do not see that any obligation to do so can be held to be incumbent on his successor, who has possessed till now upon a new agreement.

LORD WOOD.—Had there been any obligation upon Mr M'Dowall originally, and which had passed against the Duke of Argyle, of the description now insisted in, I should not have felt much, if any, difficulty in holding that the pursuer—as in place of one of the proprietors to whom, or to whose tenants it was at first undertaken—would have had a sufficient title to enforce it. But I am of opinion that any such obligation, assuming it to have previously existed, was put an end to by the proceedings which took place in 1836. It was under a new agreement then entered into that the Duke's subsequent possession was held, and which possession was of the ground occupied by the canal as it stood. He became tenant of the subject, in the condition in which it was, as at that date, at a rent of L.20 per annum, which he has since paid; and on the possession terminating, and the subject being given up, there were no farther liabilities to be discharged by the Duke.

LORD COWAN.—I am of the same opinion.

I was at first much impressed with the argument in support of the reclaiming note, which is noticed at the commencement of the Lord Ordinary's reasoning, and I am not yet prepared to acquiesce in that ground of judgment. But the case of the defender does not depend upon it. For there have been various important proceedings between the parties. There was in 1836 the action of removing at the instance of the pursuer's author, and the conjoined action of declarator at the defender's instance. The result of these actions was, that the right to this canal, as such, was held not to be in the Duke of Argyle, and that he was decerned to remove from it under this declaration—that in the event of his not removing he should be liable in a rent of L.20 per annum. This put the Duke at Campbell's mercy if the canal was necessary to the Duke or his tenants to carry on his coal-work profitably. Having obtained his decree of removing, Campbell might have compelled him to pay any rent he chose. A new agreement was then entered into.

decessors as to this canal was ignored. Campbell, as a singular successor, shook himself free of all such implied contract, and vindicated his right, as feudal proprietor of Moy, to oust the Duke out of the possession of that part of the canal which passed through his property. Had that decree of removing been carried into effect, it is not easy to see how the present claim of the pursuer could ever have been brought forward by the pursuer of that action. What has since taken place set the relation of the two proprietors upon a very simple footing. Instead of removing, it was agreed that the Duke should remain in possession of the canal at the rent of L.20. The Lord Ordinary cannot see how that relation (the only one which appears to have latterly subsisted between the parties) infers any such obligation as is alleged against the defender by the pursuer, as the basis of the present action."

This is matter of admission in the record ; and for twenty years prior to 1856, the Duke has possessed this subject as a canal at the rent then agreed on. In this new agreement there is no obligation undertaken by the Duke to restore what he got possession of as a canal, and paid rent for as a canal, to the state in which the ground was when the canal was constructed. This is the leading conclusion of the present action ; and on the ground I have stated, I think it cannot be maintained.

No. 238.
July 17, 1857.
Church of England Life
and Fire
Assurance Co.
v. Wink and
Others.

THE COURT adhered to the interlocutor reclaimed against, and found the reclaimer liable in additional expenses.

JAMES DALGLEISH, W.S.—MORTON, WHITEHEAD, & GREIG, W.S.—Agents.

THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND LIFE AND FIRE ASSURANCE TRUST AND ANNUITY COMPANY, Pursuers.—Penney—Gordon.

GEORGE WINK (James Lang's Trustee) AND OTHERS, Defenders.—D. F. Inglis—Horne—Hector.

No. 239.

I. Cautionary—Discharge of one of several co-cautioners—19 & 20 Vict. c. 60, sect. 9.—Held, that sect. 9 of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act applied only to cases where the bond of cautionary has been executed subsequent to the passing of the Act.

Process—Conclusions—Conjunct and several.—Where a summons concluded against three cautioners, conjunctly and severally, for a certain sum, and the pursuer took payment from one of them of one-third of that sum, granting him a discharge both of the claim and of the action,—Held competent, on the sum in the conclusions being restricted to the remaining two-thirds, to pronounce decree against the two other cautioners, conjunctly and severally, for that balance.

Opinion, that the discharge did not affect the rights of the cautioners inter se.

II. Rei interventus—Improbative writ.—Where parties signed and issued as binding a bond of cautionry improbable in terms of the statute,—Held (abs. Lord Wood), that the fact that money was advanced on the faith of the writ, though not alleged to have been known at the time to the parties who signed it, constituted sufficient rei interventus to make it obligatory upon them.

SEE ante, p. 415.

July 17, 1857.

I. This action, at the instance of the Church of England Life and Fire Assurance Trust and Annuity Company, and William Emmens, their secretary, concluded against James Leitch Lang and his trustee, George Hodges, John Lang, junior, and Robert Bruce Macadam, to have them ordained, "jointly and severally, to make payment" of L.480, being the balance resting due on a bond for L.800, in which James Leitch Lang had been truly the principal, and the others cautioners, although taken bound as principals. Hodges and Macadam having denied all knowledge of the transaction, except their signature of the bond, which was an improbable writ, a proof before answer was allowed (as reported already) of the pursuers' averments, by which it was sought to establish such rei interventus as would render Hodges and Macadam liable, notwithstanding the fact of the bond being improbable. This proof was now reported. In the course of it, it appeared that the pursuers had taken payment from John Lang (who had not given in any defences to the action) of L.160, being one-third of the balance sued for, and granted him a discharge in these terms:—"Therefore, and in consideration of the said sum of L.160 now paid to me, the said William Emmens, as secretary of and representing the said company, I do hereby exoner, acquit, and simpliciter discharge the said John Lang not only of the foresaid sum of L.160 paid to me as aforesaid, but also of the said action and whole procedure following thereon, in so far as he, the said John Lang, is concerned or interested as in a question with the pursuers hereof, and of all other and further claims whatsoever at the instance of the said Church of England Life and Fire Assurance Trust and Annuity Com-

2D DIVISION.
Ld. Handyside
1.

No. 239.
—
July 17, 1857.
Church of England Life
and Fire
Assurance Co.
v. Wink and Others.

pany, or the partners or office-bearers thereof, at or preceding the date hereof, in respect of the claims sued for in the before mentioned action; and the pursuers assign their claim to the extent hereby discharged, and all right, title, and interest therein, to the said John Lang, with the view of said John Lang operating his relief against the said James Leitch Lang and George Wink, or either of them: Reserving entire always the rights and claims of the said Church of England Fire and Life Assurance Trust and Annuity Company against the whole other defenders in the said action for payment of the balance of the foresaid principal sum, interest, and expenses." This transaction with Lang rendered necessary a restriction of the libel. A minute was therefore put into process, whereby, "as regarded John Robert Bruce Macadam and George Hodges, the other cautioners and defenders, the pursuers restricted their conclusions against the defenders, Macadam and Hodges, jointly and severally, to the sum of L.320, with the interest thereof from the 27th day of April," &c.

It was now contended for Hodges and Macadam that the effect of the discharge of Lang was to cut off the pursuers' claim against his co-cautioners. They founded on the 9th section of Mercantile Law Amendment Act, which provides, that "from and after the passing of this Act, where two or more parties shall become bound as cautioners for any debtor, any discharge granted by the creditor in such debt or obligation to any one of such cautioners without the consent of the other cautioners, shall be deemed and taken to be a discharge granted to all the cautioners; but nothing herein contained shall be deemed to extend to the case of a cautioner consenting to the discharge of a co-cautioner who may have become bankrupt."

In this case admittedly no consent had been given, and the section had a retroactive effect upon cautionary entered into before it passed. Its language was markedly different from that of section 8, which began, "Where any person shall, after the passing of this Act, become bound as cautioner," and then enacted that he was no longer to be entitled to the benefit of discussion. To have made that section retroactive would have introduced an essential change into the character and conditions of a contract already entered into. To make the 9th section retroactive would have no such result, but would merely change the effect of an act done after the date of the statute, the provisions of which must be assumed to have been in the view of parties.

The effect of the discharge was at any rate to relieve the defenders from liability under the present summons. Where one party was discharged it was impossible to retain an in solidum claim against the others, or to get decree under conclusions for conjunct and several liability. Each might remain liable for his own share, but no amendment was proposed restricting the conclusions to a several liability. No stipulation with Lang that action was reserved against Hodges and Macadam could possibly touch their rights, who were no parties to the deed, and the only case referred to where such a reservation was given effect to was in a discharge, not of a co-cautioner but of an insolvent principal, and that upon payment of a composition upon the whole debt. This objection was not a mere technical one—the rights of the co-cautioners had been seriously affected by the discharge. If decree went out against the present defenders, and the pursuers operated payment from one alone, they were not in a position by assignation to enable that defender to operate his relief against Lang, as the action as well as the debt had been discharged.

For the pursuers it was replied;—The terms of their reservation brought the case within that of *Smith v. Ogilvies*¹; they were entitled to decree against the defenders under the present summons without any amendment:

¹ 23d November 1821, Sh. vol. i. N. S. p. 152; 7th June 1825, H. of L. W. & S. vol. i. p. 315.

their discharge might affect the manner in which the defenders could operate their relief against their co-cautioner, by making a separate action necessary, but it did not affect, and no act of the pursuer could affect the rights inter se of the co-cautioner. The defenders' argument on the statute was unsound; the language of the 9th section was unambiguous, and therefore not liable to construction.

No. 239.

July 17, 1857.
Church of England Life
and Fire
Assurance Co.
v. Wink and Others.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In the course of the execution of the commission for proof, it appeared that John Lang, one of the cautioners and co-obligants under the bond on which the action is founded, had paid to the pursuers one-third of the whole sum concluded for,—being his full share of the sum for which the action concluded against the principal debtor James Leitch Lang, and the three co-obligants or cautioners, of whom John Lang was one. Upon this fact the defenders, who have not made any payment, have most strenuously contended that the action cannot now be insisted in to any effect against them.

Various points have been made in the course of this discussion. In the first place, it was maintained that the discharge granted to John Lang, without the consent of the other co-obligants, had the effect under the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 19 & 20 of the Queen, c. 60 sec. 9, at once to liberate the other co-obligants, and was a discharge of them all. Like many other sections of this general statute, this section may give rise to very many nice questions. It is in the following terms:—(reads.) It may be made a question (I give no opinion on the point), whether this section applies to the case of proper co-obligants, or only to parties who become bound as cautioners for a debtor. But whatever may be the effect of this section in other respects, I am of opinion that the enactment applies only in cases where parties shall become bound after the passing of the Act. This seems to me to be the plain and only admissible construction of the section. The expressions are not such as could have been employed, if intended to be applicable to existing contracts and obligations.

It was argued, that the place in which the words “from and after the passing of this Act,” were introduced into this section, was different from the collocation of these words in other sections with like provisions introduced in these other sections. I do not think that the inference or conjecture as to the meaning of the Legislature derived from this comparison of this section with the others is even in any degree supported by the terms of these other sections. But even if the argument had any plausibility from such a comparison, it would only amount to a conjecture. The terms in the 9th section are expressly applicable to those who, after the passing of this Act, shall become bound as cautioners for any debtor, and on no such general inference could my mind be brought to hold, that the clause extends to all cases in which parties are bound before the passing the Act as cautioners.

Passing by this point, the next question is, Is there anything in this discharge from which a liberation of the other co-obligants can be deduced in point of law?—(reads terms of discharge.) There are no words whatever from which any liberation of a discharge of the other defenders can be deduced. On the contrary, the pursuers reserve expressly their whole claims against them.

But it is further contended, that the nature of the act done has, in law and by necessary consequence, the effect of liberating the defenders. Nothing very definite was pleaded to us upon this point. But let us see what is the character of the act, and what are its consequences. Payment is taken from one co-obligant of a part of the debt, being his full share as a third. To that extent the defenders are benefited, and the sum reduced for which the pursuers can insist. Then, in its consequences,—How are the rights of the other defenders injured, so as to form a ground for liberation? Their liability is not thereby enlarged. It remains exactly what it was, only the amount is diminished by this payment of one-third. If they both are solvent, they will each pay a third and no more. If one fails, and the other has to pay the whole, then his right of relief against Lang is not affected by this payment and discharge, and is not attempted to be affected. There is not a word in the discharge of Lang which could liberate him in a question with the other defender, who might have to pay two-thirds. The pursuers could not by any act of theirs affect the relative obligations to each other of these co-obligants, and, unless the pursuers had undertaken to bear the risk of either of the other defenders becoming insol-

No. 239.

July 17, 1857.
Church of England Life
and Fire
Assurance Co.
v. Wink and Others.

vent, no discharge of their claim against Lang could liberate him from the obligation towards the other co-obligants, merely because he paid at once his share. But it is said, that he is discharged from the action, and that, in this process, if one of the other defenders had to pay the remaining two-thirds, that defender could not operate his relief by means of an assignation from the pursuers. I very much doubt, whether, on an assignation from the pursuers of what B might pay, a competent motion might not be made against him, as he has so worded the discharge that he reserves his right to operate his relief in this action as in right of the pursuer against the other defenders, and, therefore, is not out of the process. But whether B overpaying, owing to the insolvency of C., could operate relief from Lang in this action by an assignation from the pursuers, Lang, by the terms of the bond, is still a co-obligant with B, and the latter's right is in no degree impaired. He would have direct action against Lang. It might be more handy to operate relief in this action. But I know of no rule of law which compels a pursuer so to conduct his legal proceedings against the co-obligants, that he must, as the only condition on which he can accept payment from one debtor of his share of the debt, keep matters in such a situation that he shall be able to give an assignation of his right, in case of non-payment by another, which is effectual in that process. An assignation the pursuers can give, and the right of relief against Lang is complete and unimpaired, and the pursuers have in no respect liberated or attempted to liberate Lang. There is no ground, therefore, for finding that these defenders are liberated from their obligation.

But then a difficulty of a different description was raised. It was said: The summons concludes against the main party, and then these three co-obligants as jointly and severally liable. Now, after the discharge of one of the parties, the whole are not liable jointly and severally, and hence, it is said, the summons cannot stand. This is a very singular objection. John Lang had paid his share, and for that the defenders are no longer jointly and severally liable. But then, for what is not paid, they remain jointly and severally liable, just as if the main party had paid part of the sum concluded for. Then, why is the action not to proceed on that footing? If one of the co-obligants had been absconded on some special ground, the action would have remained good against the others as jointly and severally liable.

Further, it was argued, that, if the pursuers must now proceed against them as severally liable for their proportions of the debt, that is not competent under a summons concluding against them jointly and severally. I dissent entirely from that proposition. The pursuer in a simple action of this kind is not tied down to make out joint liability as the condition of success, or unable to succeed if he gives up, or is forced to abandon, joint and several liability. If the defenders are severally liable, he may proceed to that effect. No authority was referred to, to establish any such rule as to the construction of a summons, except an allusion to some opinions in the case of the Aberdeen Bank. But that case had no resemblance to the present, and the opinions are wholly misunderstood. It was held in that case, that the whole action was founded on the notion of joint and several liability arising out of the transactions set forth and described by the pursuers—that the admitted facts shewed that the notion of joint and several liability as to various defenders was inadmissible—and, therefore, as the foundation of the action wholly failed, the action could not be sustained to any other effect in a more limited view of the results of the averments. That was the special ground taken by some in that case, which affords no sort of precedent for the present action, or probably for any other that ever will be raised.

On these grounds I am of opinion that the Court must proceed and dispose of the case on the merits, as it now stands.

LORD MURRAY.—I entirely concur in your Lordship's view as to the interpretation of the statute.

LORD WOOD.—I concur in the opinion your Lordship has delivered, and in the views you have expressed, both with reference to the Act of Parliament which was founded on, and the effect of the discharge granted by the pursuers to Lang, one of the three cautioners, on his making payment of one-third of the balance which remained due of the original debt, being his proper share of it. That discharge only discharges the cautioner of all claims against him at the instance of the pursuers, but it leaves completely entire all the rights of the pursuers against the other two cautioners, and their rights inter se, so that should the pursuers, in the exercise of their rights, recover from one of them the two-thirds of the balance of debts still unpaid, and the other is unable to pay his third, then the cautioner who has paid the two-thirds will, in virtue of his undischarged right, be entitled to recover the half of the one-third overpaid by him from Lang, so as thereby to throw the proper share of the insolvent cautioner equally on himself and Lang. In this state of matters, I am of opinion that the conjunct and several liability of the cautioner continues, and that there is no ground for an objection against decree to that effect being pronounced, in respect of the discharge granted to John Lang.

LORD COWAN.—We have to dispose of the pleas raised by the defenders upon the discharge granted to Lang, one of the three co-cautioners, so recently as April 1857.

By that deed, upon the narrative of the dependence of this action and of a decree in absence obtained against Lang for the sum of L.480, concluded for in the summons as the balance of the debt due to the pursuer, and in consideration of payment of the sum of L.160, being one-third of the debt sued for, the pursuer discharged the said John Lang not only of the sum of L.160, “but also of the said action and the whole procedure following thereon, in so far as he the said John Lang was concerned or interested as in a question with the pursuers thereof,” and of all other and farther claims by them “in respect of the claims sued for in the before mentioned action.” The deed further contains an assignation of the claim to the extent discharged, and reserves entire the rights and claims of the pursuer “against the whole other defenders in the said action for payment of the balance of the foresaid principal sum, interest, and expenses.”

The conclusions of the action have been restricted in consequence of this discharge to two-thirds of the sums claimed in the summons; but in terms thereof decree is sought to that extent against the defenders, Macadam and Hodges.

The defenders first maintain, that the effect of this discharge is to liberate them from farther liability for the debt sued for, under the provision contained in the 9th section of 19 & 20 Victoria, ch. 60.

Although the application of the statute to cautionary obligations subsisting at the date of the Act were otherwise clear, I am not satisfied that it would have the effect of liberating the defenders, having regard to the circumstances in which the discharge was granted. It is not the discharge of one of several cautioners during the currency of the obligation of the debtor. He has become bankrupt, and been sequestrated; and the obligation of the three cautioners for the sum sued for in the action has become prestable. Their non-payment of the debt thus due by them has been the cause of these proceedings being instituted, and it is only during their dependence that his own proper share being paid by one of the defenders, the pursuers have granted to him this discharge of the debt. From that discharge no disadvantage, as regards their relation to the principal debtor, could possibly ensue to the other defenders; and it may be questioned whether, in this position of matters, the parties having become in truth co-debtors, the statutory provision is in any view pleadable.

But however this may be, the conclusive answer to the plea is, that in its terms the statutory provision has regard only to cases “where two or more parties shall become cautioners for any debtor from and after the passing of this Act.” The cautionary obligation, to be within these terms, must have been entered into of a date subsequent to the passing of the Act. The statutory words have no application to obligations granted previous to, and subsisting at, the date of its passing. In all such cases the effect of a discharge of the co-cautioner must be judged of by the rules of common law, and not by the enactments of the statute which innovate upon those rules.

I do not think it of any materiality that some of the sections of this statute, which applies to a variety of matters quite unconnected with each other, may be read and construed as applicable to subsisting obligations. What we have alone to do with is the effect of this specific provision, which in clear terms contemplates future obligations as alone within its purview. I do not think the clause capable of a construction to bring within its operation subsisting cautionary obligations; and although it were, it appears to me to be of a character not to admit of such a liberal interpretation as would require in any view to be given to it to support the defen-

No. 239.

July 17, 1857.
Church of England Life
and Fire
Assurance Co.
v. Wink and
Others.

No. 239. der's plea. The Act is an innovation on the common law, not to be extended beyond its actual terms.

July 17, 1857.
Church of England Life
and Fire
Assurance Co.
v. Wink and Others.

It may be somewhat anomalous to leave the position of co-cautioners in obligations undertaken prior to the Act to stand so differently from that of those who have entered on the obligation subsequent to the statute. But this anomaly cannot be corrected by judicial decision. The remedy must be sought for elsewhere.

But, secondly, it is alleged by the defenders, that this discharge has at common law the effect of doing away with the conjunct and several liability concluded for against them, and ought to lead to their absolvitor from this action.

Now, 1. I do not think it can in any view be alleged that the discharge entitles the defender to absolvitor. The separate liability, each for his own share, remains untouched, and decree may be pronounced with perfect competency against each for L.160, or one-third of the debt sued for. The case of the Aberdeen Bank is quite different.

2. The reservation in the discharge keeps entire to the co-cautioners their right to be relieved by the party discharged; but it puts an end to procedure at the instance of the creditor against that party in relation to this debt. Were its effect to keep the decree in absence in force so as to permit of its being assigned to either of the other defenders on payment of the balance of debt, then there would obviously be no innovation on the state of the interests of the co-cautioners. But holding, as I think must be held, that the decree against Lang cannot be assigned, and that the only effectual decree to be pronounced in this action is for two-thirds of the debt against the two defenders,—there is a difficulty attending the right of the pursuer to have that decree against the defenders conjunctly and severally to the full extent of the debt.

The pursuer was not entitled by any act of his pending the process to place the defenders in a worse position relating to their co-cautioner, Lang, than they stood in previously as co-cautioners at common law. Had there been no discharge, and had decree gone out against the three for the L.480, then any one paying would be entitled to have the decree assigned to him, so as to proceed against either of the other two to the extent of one-half of the debt. This remedy is denied to the one or other of the two defenders that may pay the whole L.320 remaining due, to the extent of one-sixth of the original debt of L.480. And probably the decree to be now pronounced against them jointly and severally ought to be qualified, to the effect that it should be enforced by the pursuer against the one or other only to the extent of one-half of the original debt, or L.240.

I do not, however, press this view, because practically, the parties continuing solvent, and the claim of relief against Lang competent to either of the defenders being entire, the first apportionment of this debt among the co-cautioners may be secured, should either of the two defenders fail to pay his proper share—by separate proceedings taken against Lang by the co-cautioner who pays under the decree to be pronounced. The only objection is, that if necessary for him to proceed against Lang, he is prevented by the act of the pursuer from doing so under an assignment to this decree, and runs the risk of Lang's continued solvency.

II. The case was now argued on the merits; and in so far as the argument went beyond the import of the proof, it was confined to an application of the views formerly pressed on the Court to the facts, as each party held them to be established by the proof.¹

The facts, as held by the Court to have been proved, were thus stated by Lord Cowan:—"The proof establishes, that the bond was prepared in the English form in London—that it was transmitted to Glasgow on 23d October 1852 for the subscription of the borrower and of his sureties—that, after being executed by them, it was returned to London as a completed deed—and that, on the faith of the bond being thus complete, the pursuers remitted the amount to the borrower in Glasgow on 1st November 1852. No. 239. The proof farther establishes, that, in the negotiations for the loan, Lang, the principal debtor, was applied to for the names of his sureties—that the two defenders did both of them agree to become his cautioners—that the bond when transmitted from London was sent by Mr Baird, the Glasgow agent of the pursuers, to Lang for the signature of the parties—that Lang sent his clerk, after having himself subscribed it, to get it executed by the two defenders—that it was subscribed by them, in the knowledge, as must be held, of its contents and of its form—that it was thereafter sent by Lang to the agent of the pursuers at Glasgow, with the annexed receipt for the money—and that it was by him transmitted to London in order that the amount of the loan might be remitted to Lang, as was actually done, by the pursuers on the faith of the bond being complete.

¹ Bell's Pr., sec. 86, p. 26; Johnston v. Grant, 28th Feb. 1844; Ballantyne, 21st Jan. 1842; Sutherland, 12th Nov. 1835; Hamilton v. Wright, 12th Feb. 1838, H. of L., iii. Sh. and M'L., p. 127.

July 17, 1857.
Church of England Life
and Fire
Assurance Co.
v. Wink and Others.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—We have already expressed our opinions on the objection to the right of the pursuers to insist further in this action in respect of the payment by and discharge granted to one of the co-obligants, John Lang, and have held that the right of the pursuers to insist against the other defenders is in no degree impaired; and we are now to dispose of the proof adduced in support of the pursuer's plea of rei interventus, in order to give him right of action on the bond in question, although improbativ by the law of Scotland. Of course we must revert to the opinions expressed by ourselves on the elaborate arguments on the points stated on both sides before the proof was allowed, and must carefully consider with reference to these points, whether the facts now proved really do amount to what is necessary to give effect to an improbativ document by reason of rei interventus. In considering that matter, I need not say, after the opinion I expressed in Johnstone v. Grant, that I am in no degree disposed to go one jot further than the decided cases prescribe in sustaining that plea, so far as founded on facts belonging to the actual completion and fulfilment of the contract. And I wish to avoid any expression of opinion as to many of the simpler cases urged by the defenders at the former discussion, and more difficult for determination than the case before us.

First, as to the averment of the cautioner's knowledge of the facts which are founded upon as rei interventus,—I stated formerly that the averment of such knowledge might be very important, for such knowledge might give a very different character to the facts following the subscription of the bond from that which they might otherwise possess. But I carefully avoided any indication of opinion that the cautioner's or co-obligant's knowledge of what followed is at all necessary to enable the creditor to found on the facts which did follow the subscription as effectual rei interventus. I entirely dissent from the doctrine, if meant to be stated as a rule of law, that the facts must be known to the party signing the improbativ document. I have some doubt whether the expressions of Mr Bell ought to be taken in that strict light. But, at all events, if such is their import, I am of opinion that he is there in error. The principle of rei interventus in such a case is in my apprehension this, viz., that the party signing such a document has given it over to the intended creditor to be used in the way, and for the purpose, intended, and that, if others have acted on the faith of it, and in reliance on it being given out by him for practical use as his obligation, and to be taken as such, he is not entitled to turn round and plead defects in point of form against those whom he has encouraged to rely upon his signature.

It is of no importance, in my opinion, that there may not be separate evidence, that the defender did not know that the money had not been paid, but was to be paid on the faith of their signatures. It is sufficient that the necessary presumption in the circumstances is, that they must have known that to be the state of the fact, when they signed the bond.

But, the bond bore before signature that the money was paid. But could any human being imagine and believe that the money was paid before any one signed the bond as liable for the debt, especially when the party to get the money was only to get it on the signature of others besides himself? Now, the bond was signed on the same day by the main party as well by the co-obligants, and one of the defenders signed at the same time with the main party to whom the loan was

No. 239.
 July 17, 1857.
 Church of England Life
 and Fire
 Assurance Co.
 v. Wink and Others.

to be made, while there was a blank for the signature of the others. Any one signing must have known, just as much as if he had been expressly told it, that the money was only to be advanced when the obligation was signed by all who were to be bound. If, then, any knowledge of the fact that the money was to be paid after the bond was signed, could be required, I should hold that the presumption in the circumstances of this case was quite sufficient to satisfy such a requisite.

But I am clearly of opinion that such knowledge need not be separately and distinctly proved. The party gives forth the document with his subscription to and in favour of the creditor, in order that his subscription may be relied on, and the document used and acted on in the way which the nature of the writing necessarily implied that it should be so used and acted on.

Then, having carefully reconsidered the grounds of the opinion in which we all generally concurred after full deliberation on the pleas formerly discussed before us, we have now to consider what matters of fact have been proved. The result is this: A transaction for a loan having been proposed, and the security of co-obligants having been required, a bond is prepared in London, and is sent to the agent of the Company in Glasgow, that he may obtain the necessary subscriptions. He does so, but not in the Scotch form. Then, after it is so signed, the main party signs a receipt for the sum, which is added to the bond, therein trusting to the Company and its agent. The Company thus receive in London the completed document, and the receipt for the money, before one shilling is advanced. It was thus sent out of Scotland to English parties to be acted upon as an obligation for the intended loan. I look on this transmission to London, to parties not to be presumed to be acquainted with Scotch law, as a very material fact in the question of rei interventus. The parties could not but know, as they must be presumed to have known from the document which they signed, that they gave a document to English parties to be acted and relied upon.

When it is so received in London—the transmission to which place being the object contemplated, and the result of the joint act of all the co-obligants in so signing it—the Company then, on the faith (as the real facts prove, and as is expressly sworn) that they had received a valid and good document of debt from all these parties, send down the money to Scotland, and it is paid to the party to whom the obligants intended it should be paid. In the circumstances of this case I am of opinion that the payment of the money, after the bond was signed as described, and after its transmission to London, is rei interventus in the eye of law sufficient to show, that the party relied, and was entitled to rely, from acts for which the defenders are responsible, that they had no legal defence to plead against their own subscriptions, and against their obligation for the money.

In all the material facts, this case is much more favourable for the creditor than was the state of the proof in the case of Johnstone v. Grant. The equity to exclude the legal objection to the deed as improbative, seems to me to be in this case as strong as can well be imagined, pleaded as it is against the English creditor to whom the defenders allowed the bond to be sent as their personal obligation, in the eyes of Englishmen formal, complete, and binding. The Company were thus bound to pay on the faith of that document, and the defenders are clearly barred from saying our subscriptions are made in the form required by a Scotch statute.

I am, therefore, glad that no rule of law compels me to sanction the gross injustice which would result from this iniquitous attempt to resist payment of a just debt.

LORD MURRAY concurred, expressing his regret that the Mercantile Law Amendment Act had contained no remedy for the inconveniences and evils which spring from the diversity between the laws of England and Scotland as to the formal execution of writs.

LORD WOOD was absent.

LORD COWAN.—The Court have now to dispose of this case on the proof allowed by the interlocutor of 12th February 1857.—(His Lordship then stated the import of the proof as given above).

The facts thus established by the proof are in my opinion sufficient in law to support the plea of rei interventus.

The nature of that plea—what requires to be made out by the party pleading it—and the authorities bearing on the question—were fully discussed and considered, when the case was advised and this proof allowed. It is unnecessary to do more, therefore, than to refer to the full report of our decision at that time, and to say that the proof by the pursuers is sufficient, as I think, to support their case. No. 239.

July 17, 1857.
Finlay v.
Allan.

The defenders say that the several acts and proceedings relied on have not been shewn by the proof to have been known to, and permitted by, them to take place on the faith of the contract. But all the assent and knowledge which it was necessary in a case like this to shew are made out sufficiently on the face of the proof. A party, who has been applied to to become cautioner in a transaction like this, and who has put his name to the written deed by which the obligation was constituted, cannot but be held to have given his assent to the completion of the transaction on the faith of it. One who has given a written mandate to another cannot be listened to, when the subject of the mandate has been executed, in repudiating the act on the ground of its not having had his special assent and sanction.

I hold the cases so fully commented upon in the opinions delivered when the proof was allowed, to be conclusive on this point. The cases of Henderson, of Brown v. Campbell, and of Balfour v. Thomson, were all decided upon the principle, that the informal cautionary obligation, given to the debtor for the purpose of being acted on, was rendered a complete obligation by the acts done on the faith of it by the creditor, without any farther evidence of knowledge or assent of the cautioner being required. And, as regards money obligations, the case of Grant v. Johnston is of great value, and in its application to the special circumstances of this case, of conclusive authority. The valuable observations by Lord Medwyn in his opinion in that case are strictly applicable to this cautionary obligation, and to the effect of what passed on the faith of it, as sufficient in law to support the plea of the pursuers.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Repel the objections of the defenders founded on the discharge granted to John Lang; and find that facts and circumstances have been proved, amounting in law to sufficient rei interventus to enable the pursuers to proceed to enforce the obligation contained in the bond libelled on; and therefore find that the defenders, George Hodges and John Robert Bruce Macadam, are jointly and severally liable for the sum of L.320 remaining due under said bond, with interest thereon, as concluded for; reserving to them their right of relief against James Leitch Lang and his estate, or against John Lang, either in this action, in so far as competent, or in another process, and decern: Find the defenders liable in expenses," &c.

M'BRAIR & PARKER, W.S.—MURRAY & RHIND, W.S.—Agents.

JOHN FINLAY, Suspenders and Pursuers.—D. F. Inglis—Hector. No. 240.
JAMES ALLAN, Respondent and Defender.—Macfarlane—A. B. Shand.

Exclusive privilege—Patent.—An inventor patented improvements on fire-grates, of which the principal feature was an overhanging door of novel construction, causing a double draught. In his specification he claimed as part of the invention secured to him by the patent the "application and use" of a detent link or holder of a peculiar form to retain the door in its position, but which was proved to have been previously used and applied to grates without overhanging doors;—Held, that the use of a similar detent link, when applied to an overhanging door, but which did not produce a double draught, was not an infringement of the patent.

In October 1852, John Finlay, ironmonger in Glasgow, obtained letters patent for an invention of "improvements in grates and fire-places, or apparatuses for the generation of heat." In June 1856, he brought the present action of suspension and interdict for an alleged infringement of his patent. The invention was described in the specification as relating "to various improvements in fire-grates, for obtaining increased efficiency of draught therein, together with the better radiation of heat, and the accurate July 17, 1857.
2^D DIVISION.
R.

No. 240.

July 17, 1857.
Finlay v.
Allan.

and easy adjustment of the regulating details for modifying the draught, and the combustion of the fuel, and the consumption of smoke." After describing the nature of the alleged invention, and the manner in which it might be used, the specification concluded with the following summary of the particulars of his invention :—" What I consider to be novel and original, and therein claim as the invention secured to me by the hereinbefore in part recited letters patent, is,—1st, The application and use of an overhanging back door, for obtaining two separate vents or passages for the products of combustion. 2d, The system or mode of arranging and constructing fire-grates and fire-places, wherein the front or main draught, and the back or secondary draught, are simultaneously adjusted and regulated. 3d, The system or mode of carrying off the dense smoke and vapours of fuel by a back or secondary draught, as herein before described. 4th, The application and use of a detent link or holder, with undulating notches or holding surfaces, acting in both directions by the use of lateral or simple pressure only, as herein before described."

The case was sent for trial by jury on the following issues :—" It being admitted, that on 1st October 1852, the pursuer, John Finlay, obtained letters patent, bearing to be for improvements in 'grates and fire-places, or apparatus for the generation of heat :'

" Whether the pursuer caused to be filed a specification in terms of the proviso contained in said letters patent ; and whether, during the year preceding 1st June 1856, or any part thereof, and during the currency of the said letters patent, the defender James Allan, senior, did wrongfully, and in violation of the said letters patent, within his manufacturing premises, or shops or warehouses or other premises occupied by him at or near Elmbank, or in or near Blytheswood Buildings, Bothwell Street, all in or near Glasgow, make or sell or use a grate or grates, having applied thereto, and used as part thereof, a detent link or holder, formed with undulating notches or holding surfaces, acting in both directions, by the use of lateral or simple pressure only, as described in the said specification ?

Or,

" 1. Whether the application or use, in connection with a grate or grates, of a detent link or holder, with undulating notches or holding surfaces, acting in both directions, by the use of lateral or simple pressure only, as described in the said specification, was known and publicly used within the united kingdom prior to the date of the said letters patent ?

" 2. Whether the application or use, in connection with a grate or grates, of a detent link or holder, with undulating notches or holding surfaces, acting in both directions, by the use of lateral or simple pressure only, as described in the said specification, was not an improvement of any public benefit or advantage ?"

At the trial, which took place before Lord Neaves, the pursuer examined a number of skilled witnesses. It was proved that the grate protected by the pursuer's patent was so constructed that the back of the grate formed a door, hinged on pivots, near its lower extremity, which might be drawn forward so as to overhang the fire, without entirely closing the passage for smoke, whereby certain advantages were gained. The principal feature of the invention was, that the back was so arranged, that on being pushed back so as to open or enlarge the passage for smoke up the chimney, there was opened, not only what might be termed the front or direct draught into the chimney in front of the moveable back, but also a back draught, or secondary air passage, under and behind the moveable back, from near the level of the burning fuel, by which the denser smoke was carried off, and had no chance of escaping into the room. The moveable back was held in any required position, by means of a notched bar called a detent link or holder (mentioned in the 4th head of the summary of the specification), having notches so constructed as to admit of the movement of the back by lateral or simple pressure only, applied to the back, without any special adjustment of the detent. The grate complained of as an infringement of the patent had also a moveable overhanging back, which was held in its position by a detent similar to that used by the pursuer, but there was no double draught. It was proved that similar detents or holders had been used previous to the pursuer's patent.

No. 240.
July 17, 1857.
Finlay v.
Allan.

The pursuer's proof being concluded, it appeared to the parties that the questions involved were more fit for the consideration of the Court than the jury, and the following verdict was therefore agreed to:—"Find for the pursuer, with leave to the defender to move the Court to enter the verdict for him upon any point of law, against the validity of the patent, raised by the evidence in the Judge's notes, so far as relates to the validity of the patent generally, or to the part of the patent said to be infringed upon, and so far as such objections could competently have been stated at the trial.—The defender agreed to withdraw his issues upon the understanding assented to by the pursuer, that in stating his case for the verdict being entered up for him on the evidence adduced, he was in no respect to be thereby limited or prejudiced."

It was moved for the defender, that the verdict should be entered up for him. It was argued:—The pursuer's patent was for an overhanging door and a double draught; the detent or holder was only claimed as part of and in combination with that invention. If the patent was for the application of a detent link or holder similar to that of the pursuer's, when not used in combination with such a double draught door, that was not a valid subject of patent, such detents or holders having been in use long previous to his invention. If prior use could be shewn of any part of what was claimed as a new invention, the patent was bad; the machinery was of the commonest description, and prior use of the detent or holder had been proved. A specification, where a novel use of an old invention was claimed, required to be clear and specific.¹ The specification was not of a new mode of applying and using the detent, but of "the application and use" of it (4th head of specification). No doubt it had not previously been used to hold the door at and before the perpendicular; but there was no novelty in the contrivance, or in the mode in which it was applied for that purpose; and, at any rate, there should have been a disclaimer of any exclusive right to use it for holding behind the perpendicular. It having been proved that a part of the invention, at least, was in use before the patent, the want of a disclaimer of its use to that extent was a fatal blot,² because it being law that a party using part of an invention is as much an infringer as one who pirates the whole of it,³ the converse must hold that no man is entitled to a patent, unless the whole invention claimed be new.⁴

It was answered for the pursuer;—The argument of the defender against the validity of the patent could not be competently urged, as there was no plea to that effect on the record, and his issues were only as to previous use, ¹ Coryton on Patents, pp. 135–296; Campion v. Benyon, 3d July 1821 (Common Pleas), III. Brod. and Bing. p. 5; Templeton v. Macfarlane, 23d Feb. 1848, ante, vol. x. p. 796, in H. L. 27th June 1848, I. Clark and Finelly (N. S.) p. 595.

² Hindmarsh, p. 115.

³ Smith v. North Western Railway Company, 30th April 1853 (Q. B.), II. Ellis and Black., p. 69.

⁴ The defenders also cited Losh v. Hague (1838), Webster's Cases, p. 202; Hill v. Thompson, III. Merivale, p. 622; Reg. v. Wheeler, II. Barn. and Ald. p. 349; Brunton v. Hawkes, IV. Barn. and Ald. p. 541; Minter v. Mower, Webster's Cases, p. 138.

No. 240.

July 17, 1857.
Finlay v.
Allan.

and as to the public utility of the invention.¹ Such objections to the pursuer's patent could not have been competently urged at the trial, and there was only reserved to the defender by the verdict his right to urge objections against the validity of the patent, "so far as such objections could be competently stated at the trial." The detent or holder, so far as regarded its application and use, was a part of the invention secured by the patent.² The patent was valid to protect this application of the detent, which was proved to be both new and beneficial—the two requisites of a good patent.³ A patent might be for an application of previously known means to produce a new result, of new materials to produce a previously known result, or of old materials to produce a previously known result, provided there was some advantage in the manner in which it was proposed the old materials should be used or applied.⁴ In applying the detent link to his grate, it was used to retain the door in a manner in which it had not been previously applied, and in such a manner as to be productive of advantage. It was of importance to observe that it was not claimed as a detent in connection with a double draft door, but as a detent to regulate the position of an overhanging door. It was of little consequence whether the patent was to be held as protecting two separate inventions of a detent or a double draft, or a single invention combining both of these. In the one case, an infringement of one invention might be subject of complaint as well as both, and, in the other, the complaint was of an infringement on a portion of an invention secured by patent, which was equally a proper ground of complaint.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In the view which I entertain of this case, in common. I believe, with the rest of the Court, it will not be necessary to state at length any general principles as to patent law. I will only say, therefore, that I have been guided by and desire to adhere to the principles contained in the opinions of Lord Tenterdon in Brunton v. Hawkes, IV. Barnewell and Alderson, and in Kay and Marshall, and in King v. Wheeler,—of Lord Dunmore in Minter v. Mower,—of Lord Eldon in Hill v. Thompson, and of Lord Abinger in Losh v. Hague.

Taking the principles enumerated in these cases as my guide, let us see what is the point raised by the issue in this case. (Reads.) Plainly, what is complained of is simply the use of a detent link or holder acting in the way described. Then the first, perhaps I should say the only, question in this case is, what is it which this patent of Finlay's claims? Does it claim the use of the detent link in a general way, so as to comprehend the use of it as employed in the defender's grate, in other particulars essentially different from the pursuer's?

(Reads title and specification.)

I am of opinion that the detent link is only claimed as a part of the practical use or regulation of the door for double draught, and is not claimed separately for any other back of a grate.

Hence the defender's grate is no infringement of the pursuer's patent.

LORD MURRAY.—I concur.

LORD WOOD.—The pursuer's patent bears in its title to be one "for improvements in grates or fire-places, or apparatus for the generation of heat;" and in the commencement of the specification it is stated that "my said invention relates to various improvements in fire-grates, for obtaining increased efficiency of draught therein, together with the better radiation of heat, and the accurate and easy adjustment of the regulating details for modifying the draught, and the combustion of the fuel, and the consumption of smoke." Then there follows the explanation or description of the invention, as previously set forth. And at the conclusion

¹ Losh v. Hague (1838), ut. sup.; Neilson v. Househill Company, 15th November 1842, ante, vol. v, p. 86.

² Hindmarsh on patents, p. 181.

³ Smith v. North Western Railway Company, 30th April 1853, ut. sup.

⁴ Crain v. Price, 13th June 1842 (Com. Pleas), Webster's Cases, p. 377; Kay v. Marshall, 8th May 1839 (Com. Pleas), 5 Bing. (N. S.) p. 492; Queen v. Curran, 2d December 1847 (2 B.), III. Car. & Kirwan, p. 215.

of the specification it is farther stated, "what I consider to be novel and original, and therefore claim as the invention secured to me by the herein-before in part recited letters patent, is." And then, under four heads immediately following, there is stated what is so claimed as the invention secured by the patent.

No. 240.

July 17, 1857.
Finlay v.
Allan.

Now, taking the whole specification together, it appears to me that the thing which is patented is not one consisting of various parts claimed separately, but one of various parts in connection or combination, producing or obtaining the beneficial results mentioned in the specification. I cannot read it as a patent for an overhanging back-door in grates, apart from its being one so arranged as to be adapted "for furnishing" (to use the words of the specification) "a means of back draught or secondary air passage at a lower level." The overhanging door to which the patent applies is not simply an overhanging door leaning or inclining from the perpendicular to the front to be adjusted or regulated in its position in any of the ways explained, but referring to the first of the four enumerating heads at the close of the specification, it is "an overhanging back-door for obtaining two separate vents or passages for the products of combustion." This is the overhanging back-door, the use and application of which is that claimed, and the resulting beneficial and novel effects of it form in truth the real substance and merit of the pursuer's invention. The second head has relation to fire-grates or fire-places, wherein the front or main draught, and the back or secondary draught, are simultaneously regulated, and the third to the system or mode of carrying off smoke, and so on, by the back or secondary draught. All this is in perfect conformity to the preceding portions of the specification.

The 4th head of the claim is "the application and use of a detent link or holder, with undulating notches or holding surfaces, acting in both directions by the use of lateral or simple pressure only, as herein before described." Then going back to the previous description referred to, which follows immediately after the description of the back-door, it commences thus, "The adjustment of the draught door may be affected in various ways, as, for example"—and it then proceeds to give, among others, one for its adjustment by the use of what is called in the 4th head a detent link or holder with undulating notches.

Now as I read the specification, the only draught door, the adjustment of which is there described to be so affected, and to which, I conceive, it has exclusive reference—is a double draught, working both to the front and back of the perpendicular; that is, to take the words of the specification, a door which, "leaning or inclining backwards towards the chimney or wall in which the grate is placed, or which inclines forwards from its bottom joint towards the room."

I therefore think that the application and use of a detent link or holder is claimed solely in connection or combination with a double draught door, and not in relation to any adjustment of an overhanging back-door, not arranged to produce a double draught. In short, I am of opinion that the pursuer makes his claim, and has accordingly, in conformity to his claim and accompanying specification, obtained his patent for the whole inseparably, and not for distinct parts, except as combining to make such a whole as he describes.

Such being the nature of the patent, it is, I apprehend, a good patent; and there is no ground for maintaining its invalidity in respect of bad subject-matter. In this view it is unnecessary to inquire either whether or not there would have been ground for such an objection, had each part of that whole, which in connection is claimed as the pursuer's invention, been claimed separately; or whether or not, supposing there had been ground for the objection, it would have been open in the shape of the pleadings and terms of the issues to insist in it.

Then as to infringement by the defender of the patent right thus secured to the pursuer. If the defender has violated the patent, it is not by the use of a double draught door, or the adjustment of it by the application and use of a detent link or holder, for it is admitted that a door of that description forms no part of the grates made by the defender. Accordingly such infringement is not alleged or put in issue. What is put in issue is, that the defender did wrongfully "make, sell, or use a grate or grates, by having applied thereto, and used as a part thereof, a detent link or holder, formed with undulating notches or holding surfaces, acting in both directions, by the use of lateral or simple pressure only, as described in the said specification." And the fact as established by the proof is, that what the defender

No. 240. does in the construction and management of his grates is, that there being placed therein a vertical draught door which has no opening at its lower edge to form a double draught, and by which, therefore, no double draught is obtained, but which works not only to the back but to the front of the perpendicular, he uses a detent link or holder to regulate the position of this door, and to fix it at any desired point throughout the whole space over which it moves.

July 17, 1857.
Finlay v.
Allan.

The question then comes to be, is this construction and arrangement of the defender's grates an infringement of the pursuer's patent?

Now, I apprehend that the constructing a grate with a vertical door working from the perpendicular to the back of the grate, and having its position within that space regulated by a detent link or links, but producing no double draught, would be no infringement. It is an undisputed fact upon the evidence, that grates so arranged had been in use long before the date of the pursuer's patent. In such a construction, therefore, there could be neither novelty nor merit. It had become public property, and the adoption of it could not constitute an infringement of the patent. If, therefore, there be an infringement in the defender's mode of constructing his grates, the infringement must consist in this, that the vertical door—by which no double draught is obtained—works not only from the perpendicular to the back, but forward from the perpendicular to the front of the grate, and that, in this last part of its movement, as well as in the first, its position is regulated or adjusted by the detent link or holder.

Now, taking the patent to be such as I have already stated I hold it to be, it does not appear to me that this extension of the old use of the detent link for the adjustment of the vertical door when moved to the front of the perpendicular, and so coming to overhang the fire more or less according to the position in which it is fixed for the time, but without a double draught being produced, is a violation of the patent, the really material and essential part of the patented invention being a door by which a double draught is produced, and in connection with which alone it is that the use or application of the detent link or holder is described in the specification as a means of adjusting the position of the door, or is stated at the conclusion of the specification to form part of the pursuer's claim in the heads under which he sets forth "what I consider to be novel and original, and therefore claim as the invention secured to me by the herein before in part recited letters patent." I do not think that, according to a sound construction of the pursuer's patent, a door working in front of the perpendicular, but in that producing a double draught, regulated by a detent link or holder, is separated from one by which a double draught is produced, so as to be a separate and distinct invention, or arranged in grates and secured by the patent.

I am of opinion that, according to the sound construction of the pursuer's patent, a door working in front of the perpendicular regulated by a detent link, but with no double draught, is inseparable from one by which a double draught is produced, and that a door of that kind in connection with a detent link for its regulation, cannot be claimed as a separate and distinct part of the pursuer's invention in the arrangement and construction of grates secured by his patent, so as to admit of their adoption alone, without the production of a double draught, being stated to be an infringement of the patent.

But, granting that a door working to the front of the perpendicular, and adjusted by a detent link or holder, without a double draught, were separable from that part of the pursuer's invention which consists in the production of a double draught, I should be disposed to think that the patent had not been infringed by the defender, and that, having regard to the statements and pleas upon the record, and to the facts confessedly proved as to the prior use of the detent link for regulating doors in grates, the defender would have a good answer to the action.

Neither a single draught-door nor the application of a detent link to it is a new invention. Therefore, in constructing grates with a door working to the front of the perpendicular, regulated by a detent link, but without a double draught, the defender is only extending what was previously known and used in the manufacture of grates. It is only an old thing or contrivance applied to a new object, which is merely a double or new use or application of an art or invention previously well known: and not only so, but as far as I can see, it is a use and application made without any new contrivance or mode of application being either necessary or resorted to, and by which no new and material part of the pursuer's invention, as described in the specification, is adopted by the defender either in combination, or not in combination with what is old. No. 240.

July 17, 1857.
Finlay v.
Allan.

But I abstain from enlarging upon this view of the case, not considering it necessary to the decision of the matter before the Court.

I am of opinion that the verdict ought to be entered up for the defender.

LORD COWAN.—I am of opinion that the verdict ought to be entered for the defender.

The leading question raised by the argument upon the Judges' notes relates to the construction of the specification, and of the letters.

An alternative view was submitted by the defender's counsel, either that the subject matter of the patent was to be taken as one invention, consisting of a combination of the four particulars set forth in the specification, and therein stated to be what the patentee considered to be novel and original; or, that the particular matters described, and especially the fourth, relative to the detent link or holder, were to be taken as separately claimed as the subject-matter of the patent. In either view it was contended that the pursuer had failed in his case, and the defence was established.

1. It seems to me that the more correct view is, that the several improvements claimed as new are set forth as forming in combination a grate of the improved description invented by the patentee, and that the specification admits of being read to no other effect. I need not go over the specification in detail. It is plain to me that the overhanging door with its hinge near its lower edge, so as to furnish a double draught to carry off the smoke and heated air, cannot be separated from the means by which the door is moved backward or forward, for the purpose of enlarging or diminishing the orifices at the top and bottom of the door, that causing the double draught into the chimney; in other words, from the detent link or holder by which the door is kept in position. The whole taken together constitutes the invention described in the specification.

In this view of the patent its validity cannot be impugned, but the result is that there is no infringement of the pursuer's right to justify this action against the defender.

The grate made and sold by the defender has no double draught door. There is used in it a detent link or holder for detaining the door so as to regulate the extent of the opening into the chimney at the desired position, whether in front of or behind the perpendicular; but there is no under opening or orifice to the effect of creating a double draft. There is thus an essential difference between the grate of the defender complained of, and the grate which is the subject of the pursuer's patent, in the view of the specification now mentioned.

2. Assuming, however, that the detent link or holder could be viewed as a distinct matter of this patent, the answer of the defender is no less conclusive. There is no novelty, having regard to the facts in evidence on the Judge's notes, to support the patent.

The detent link or holder is in no essential respect different from that proved to have been in use prior to the patent in Jobson's grate. There is a difference in the effect caused by the use of the one or other from the position on the grate to which it is attached, of the door which moves in the link or holder. In Jobson's grate the door opens only backwards from the perpendicular. In the pursuer's the door may be detained either in front of or backwards from the perpendicular. It is obvious to me that this arises not from any difference in the detent link or holder used in the one grate as contrasted with the other, or from the mode of its operation and its effect in detaining the door at the desired position, but from the mode in which the bottom of the door is attached to the under part of the grate. In Jobson's it is so fixed as not to be capable of being kept in front of the perpendicular. In the pursuer's the hinge joint is so placed relatively to the rest of the grate as to permit of the door being kept either before or backwards from the perpendicular. The link or holder affording the means of keeping the door at any precise point, is however the same in both grates. There is absolutely no difference. By lateral pressure on the door, whether in the one or the other, it is moved

No. 240. backwards or forwards, and kept in position by the same description of detent link or holder.

July 18, 1857.
Halliday v.
Morison.

While on this alternative view I am of the opinion now expressed, I think it a better construction of the patent to hold the pursuer's invention to consist in the combination of the particulars in the specification, which does not disturb the validity of the pursuer's patent, though the result is, that verdict must be entered for the defender.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor :—"Find that the grate of the defender is not an infringement of the pursuer's patent, according to the meaning and sound construction of the patent and specification on which the issue is founded, and therefore find that the verdict must be entered up for the defender : Find the defender entitled to the expenses of the discussion on these motions, and remit," &c.

ALEX. HAMILTON, W.S.—MACBRAIR & PARKER, W.S.—Agents.

No. 241. MRS ISABELLA GRAHAM OR HALLIDAY, Pursuer.—F. W. Clark.
MRS JEAN CARRUTHERS OR MORISON, Defender.—Pattison.

Process—Amendment of record.—Leave to amend a closed record refused, where the alleged error was said to affect only the accuracy of statement and not the essence of the case.

Process—Diligence.—In a reduction of a disposition of house property on the ground of mental incapacity, issues having been adjusted, diligence granted to recover a valuation of the property, and a discharge of the bond.

July 18, 1857.

SEE supra, p. 929.

1st Division.
Ld. Ardmillan.
C.

This case now came before the Court on the pursuer's motion for leave to correct an alleged error in the record. In her revised condescendence she had averred inter alia that previous to her mother's death part of the subjects in question had been let on a thirty year's lease "at a reduced rent of L.30 per annum," on certain conditions as to rebuilding the house by the tenant, and of the subjects reverting to the proprietors in the event of the tenant dying within a certain period, which statement was denied by the defender. The pursuer now proposed to substitute L.10 for L.30, which she alleged was a clerical error.

The defender denied that it was so. The L.30 had been all along founded on as the correct sum until the second issue proposed for the pursuer was refused.

Replied ;—This does not go to the essence of the case, but only to the accuracy of the statement.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In that case it must stand. I thought it was proposed to correct it because it went to the essence of the case. You may tell the Judge and jury that it is a clerical error, and they will attach such weight to it as they please.

MOTION refused.

The pursuer then moved for a diligence to recover a valuation of the subjects prepared after the death of Archibald Morrison, and a discharge of the bond for L.200 granted to Elizabeth Palmer. The existence of the valuation had only been recently ascertained, and it was of importance to prove the actual value of the property at the time this disposition was granted.

Objected ;—The question to be tried was one of mental incapacity. The valuation of the property had nothing to do with that. Further, there was no date attached to this alleged valuation in the specification.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I see no great objection to this. Granting the commission will not make the document evidence. No. 241.

DILIGENCE granted.

WILLIAM MACKERSY, W.S.—JOHN M'CRACKEN, S.S.C.—Agents.

July 18, 1857.
Blaikie v.
Duncan.

SIR JOHN BLAIKIE, Knt., Pursuer.—D. F. Inglis—Macfarlane.

JOHN DUNCAN, Defender.—Penney—Moir.

No. 242.

I. Process.—Jury trial.—Motion by a defender to postpone a jury trial on the ground of his agent's engagements, refused.

II. Process — Issues — Amendment of.—Held competent to amend an adjusted issue by striking out certain words which had been inadvertently inserted in it.

III. Process—Appeal—Statute 48 Geo. III. c. 151, sect. 15.—In an action for defamation, no issue in justification having been taken, the Court refused the defender a diligence to enable him to prove facts in mitigation of damages. Petition for leave to appeal against that judgment refused.

SEE supra, pp. 881 and 983.

July 18, 1857.

I. On 17th July this case again came before the Court on the defender's motion for postponement of the trial, which had been fixed for the 24th curt. The motion was put on the ground that the defender's agent had been unexpectedly engaged in a justiciary trial from 30th June till 10th July, for eighteen consecutive hours every day, and that the issues having been adjusted only on the 4th July, he felt unable to do justice to the case within so limited a time—more especially as a considerable change had taken place in the preparation in consequence of the refusal of the diligence on the 11th curt. A great deal of inquiry and of precognition of witnesses was now necessary in the north of Scotland, which was not originally contemplated, and, in these circumstances, delay might make all the difference to the defender between success or failure.

1st Division.
Ld Ardmillan.
C.

Objected by the pursuer, that the motion was unprecedented. The defender had it in his power to employ another agent. Farther, between the 9th and 24th July there was ample time for preparation for a much more difficult case than the present, the only question involved in which, was the publication of the libel and its meaning.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This motion is certainly put on a novel ground. The affidavit does not allege any peculiarity in the defence, nor that there is any remarkable extent of inquiry necessary. Under these circumstances, to grant delay would be to establish a most dangerous precedent.

MOTION refused.

Of this date the case was again called, on the pursuer's motion for leave to correct the issue, and also on a petition by the defender for leave to appeal.

II. As to the correction of the issue, the pursuer moved to be allowed to delete the words, "at the date of instituting this action," in the second issue, a few lines from the end. These words were evidently an accidental interpolation. They had crept in inadvertently, and as a clerical error might competently be deleted.¹

The motion was not opposed, and was granted.

III. The defender's petition for leave to appeal was directed against the interlocutor of 11th July refusing the defender's motion for a diligence, and was put on the ground that that interlocutor excluded the defender from the direct and appropriate proof of the averments which he had made in defence, and rendered it necessary for him to resort to secondary and more unsatisfactory proof thereof, whereby he conceived he would suffer great loss and ¹ M'Neill v. Caldwell, 24th March 1853, ante, vol. xv. p. 590; A B v. Skae, 8th July 1857, supra, p. 958.

No. 242. prejudice. He pleaded, that the point decided by the interlocutor in question, although it came before the Court in an incidental form, was of great importance, for the Court had virtually decided that where a party had not put a justification on record, he was not entitled to plead facts in mitigation of damages. This principle not having been previously established, the defender was entitled to take the opinion of the House of Lords upon it.¹ The matter excluded, here constituted the substance of the defence. In practice it had been held competent to prove such facts as shewed that statements complained of as calumnious had not been made recklessly and maliciously, but with some excuse or foundation.

July 18, 1857.
Innes.

Pleaded for the pursuer;—The judgment complained of was in accordance with the deliberate judgment in M'Neill v. Rorison, and with the practice following upon it. Further, it would be most unjust to the pursuer to allow this appeal, which probably would not be heard for three years, and during all which time the pursuer would be under the libel, and prevented vindicating his character.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a most unfavourable case for an application for leave to appeal. I do not think that a judgment on a motion for diligence would be a proper form to raise the general question which the defender refers to. It is certainly a very indirect mode of raising it. Farther, the refusing of this diligence involved other elements than the one general principle which the defender says the Court then for the first time decided. Therefore, that judgment cannot be taken as simply and purely deciding that question, which alone the defender says he wants to appeal. In every case it may be said that the refusal of diligence puts the party asking it to disadvantage in trying his case, and why should he not have the benefit of an appeal? Of all interlocutory judgments, this is the last that ought to be the subject of appeal, and therefore I am clearly for refusing this petition.

LORD IVORY.—I am of the same opinion. I was not present when the diligence was refused, but on reading this petition, I see no reason for granting it.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—I am of the same opinion. The refusal of this diligence was placed on more grounds than one, and therefore this interlocutor does not fairly raise the general question.

LORD DEAS.—There is no doubt of the fact that there not being an issue taken in justification was one of the grounds for refusing this diligence. But there were other grounds on which the Court went, and it is quite sufficient to say that although the judgment in M'Neill v. Rorison had been the reverse of what it was, there was good reason for refusing this petition.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Allow the issue to be amended: Refuse the desire of the petition, No. of process: Find the petitioner liable to the respondent in the expense of opposing the same: Allow an account thereof," &c.

MURRAY & BEITH, W.S.—BANKEN, WALKER, & JOHNSTON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 243.

DANIEL INNES, Petitioner.—A. B. Bell.

July 18, 1857.
2D DIVISION.

Poor's Roll. — The pursuer of an action of damages for adultery averred in his condescendence that he was in good circumstances. In order to carry on the action, he afterwards applied for the benefit of the poor's roll, and stated that he was a barber in Wick, sixty-five years of age, and had four children, the eldest of whom was thirteen years old; that his earnings amounted to L.28 per annum, and he had no other source of income.

THE COURT refused the application.

W. WHITE MILLAR.—Agent.

¹ M'Neill v. Rorison, 12th Nov. 1847, ante, vol. x. p. 15.

HELEN FOTHERINGHAM TAYLOR AND DAVID TAYLOR, Petitioners.—
Penney—Monro.

ROBERT HORN AND OTHERS (Taylor's Trustees), Respondents.—
Macfarlane—Millar.

No. 244.

July 18, 1857.
 Taylor v.
 Taylor's
 Trustees.

Trust—Removal of trustees.—A truster provided for an annual payment to his widow and minor children out of the rents of his heritable estate, and also for the expense of management and payment of debts;—Held that a complaint by the beneficiaries that they had been abandoned to destitution, and also alleging specific acts of mismanagement, was not a sufficient ground for the removal of the trustees.

Process—Intimation.—Petition by testamentary trustees, with concurrence of the beneficiaries, for the appointment of a judicial factor without intimation refused, but intimation ordered, and the petition remitted to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills to make an appointment in vacation.

THE late William Taylor, shipowner in Perth, left a trust-settlement^{1st Division.} appointing trustees,—all of whom accepted. He died in July 1854, and was survived by his widow, who died in April 1856, and by a daughter aged 16 years, and a son aged 15 years—the present petitioners. The truster provided an annuity of L.40 to his widow, and L.40 to his daughter till she should reach 25, to be paid out of the rents of his heritable estate. The residue of the rents were provided to the son. The truster also provided for the expense of management and the payment of debts. C.

This petition was presented by the truster's children, praying for the removal of the trustees, and the appointment of a judicial factor. They detailed the management which they complained of, and shewed that, after deduction of every possible debt, even those allowed by the trustees, there would remain a surplus income of about L.140 a-year, but they stated that the family had been abandoned to a state of complete destitution—their bodily wants as well as their education being neglected; that the female petitioner had betaken herself for subsistence to the situation of a governess, while the son had become dependent on the charity of a maternal aunt, whose own resources were but slender. The petitioners attributed the mismanagement to adverse influences amongst the trustees, one of whom was agent for the Bank of Scotland, to whom a large payment had been made, as for a debt alleged to be due by the truster, but without any claim or account lodged by the Bank. Further, the petitioners complained that they had been unnecessarily plunged into litigation with the Bank, the result of which, however, was to shew that the trustees had not been warranted in these payments to the Bank. That the trustees had also allowed two large and doubtful accounts,—one for law business, commencing in 1826 and ending in 1853, and another for repairs to ships, by a person of the name of John Smith, commencing in 1836 and ending in 1854; and the petitioners stated that on 13th May 1857, there was presented to the Lord Ordinary on the bills, by the same agents and counsel who acted for the trustees, a petition in name of the alleged creditor John Smith, praying for sequestration of the estates of their late father as of a deceased debtor. That the trustees had averred their approbation of this act, and that it was adopted at the suggestion and request of their agent acting for them. "They thus confess their own inadequacy to the proper management of the trust-estate." The petitioners suggested the appointment of a judicial factor, "as the only course open to them for obtaining the means of education and subsistence from their father's estate, and of saving what remains of it for their use."¹

The trustees lodged answers, in which they at great length justified themselves from the charge of having betrayed their trust. "The trustees have ¹ Macpherson v. A. B., 19th December 1840, ante, vol. iii. p. 315; Soutar v. Brown, 25th November 1852, ante, vol. xv. p. 89.

No. 244.
 July 18, 1857.
 Taylor v.
 Taylor's
 Trustees.

not appeared in the application for sequestration, either to approve or disapprove; but although they have taken no part, they have their own opinion. Sequestration is now a recognised form of administering the estates of deceased debtors, and few cases can be figured in which the use of it would be more beneficial than the present."

The case was called on 4th July. The petitioners pleaded;—That the trustees, by signifying their approval of the sequestration, had virtually put an end to their office. It was not till they had thus attempted to subvert the trust that this application was made. Sequestration was inexpedient, because it would place the management of the estate in the hands of persons who had no interest in it. Farther, it was doubtful whether it was competent to sequester the estate of a party deceased when insolvency was not alleged.¹

The trustees pleaded;—That the petition was incompetent. It was only when a trust had come to a dead lock, that the Court had been in use to interfere in the management of a trust.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The matters here disclosed, and the position into which this trust has come, may suggest to the trustees various reflections as to their responsibility in the future management of the estate. But I cannot say that a case has been made out for removing the trustees whom the truster appointed, and in whom he placed the management of his affairs. That would require a statement of a peculiar kind. I do not say that the Court have not power to remove them, but I do not think that a case has been made out for our interference. I also abstain from saying anything about the application for sequestration. Therefore we must refuse this petition.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—I am of the same opinion. It requires a very strong case indeed for removing testamentary trustees, and I do not think that such a case has been made out here.

LORD DEAS.—The grounds of complaint against the trustees amount truly to a difference of opinion between them and the beneficiaries as to their powers and mode of management. The trustees may be quite wrong; but, if so, the Courts of law will set them right, and may subject them in expenses. The remedy is to enforce what the beneficiaries think the sound construction of the trust-deed—not the removal of the trustees. The truster appointed them to manage his estate; and we are not entitled, on such grounds as are here stated, to set aside that appointment.

LORD IVORY absent.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Refuse the desire of the said petition, and decern: Find the respondents, the trustees, entitled to the expenses incurred by them in these proceedings, and allow them to retain payment thereof out of the trust-estate under their charge."

Of this date the trustees presented a petition for the appointment of a judicial factor on the estate; or, otherwise, for an order on the accountant in bankruptcy to superintend the administration of the trust, in terms of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, sect. 166. It would be for the advantage of all concerned if they were relieved of the trust, and they stated that this application was presented with the concurrence of the beneficiaries.

D. F. Inglis, for the trustees, moved for the appointment of a factor without intimation.

Penney, for the beneficiaries, consented.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a novelty. We may remit to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills to appoint ad interim.

D. F. Inglis.—The Court can give authority to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills to make the appointment, if there is no objection. This is no doubt a novel course, but the peculiar circumstances justify it. An appointment ad interim is not satisfactory.

¹ Milne and Co. v. Milne, 13th June 1850, ante, vol. xii. p. 1007.

LORD DEAS.—This is a thing that I am not aware was ever done before, and it is a very unsatisfactory thing to do on the last day of the Session. There is no such reason here given for superseding the trust in this summary way as was ever before given effect to. No. 244.
July 18, 1857.
M'Gillivray's
Executors v.
Masson.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I see no practical difficulty in an interim appointment by the Lord Ordinary till the meeting of the Court. We understanding the nature of these proceedings, it would be matter of course to confirm the appointment.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lords appoint this petition to be intimated on the walls and in the minute book for eight days: Farther, they remit to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills during vacation, with power to his Lordship, on expiry of the intimation hereby appointed, to consider the petition and the answers, if any, which may be lodged thereto, and to make an appointment ad interim of judicial factor on the trust-estate of the deceased William Taylor, mentioned in the petition, if his Lordship shall see fit so to do."

LAURENCE M. MACARA, W.S.—J. & J. MACANDREW, S.S.C —Agents.

JOHN WALKER AND OTHERS (M'Gillivray's Executors), Pursuers.—

Penney—A. R. Clark.

No. 245.

JAMES MASSON AND OTHERS, Defenders.—Macfarlane—Millar.

Landlord and Tenant—Personal and transmissible—Obligation—Heritable and moveable.—In a lease of a farm, the incoming tenant bound himself to pay to the outgoing tenant any sums he might be entitled to for meliorations, and the landlord bound himself, his heirs and successors, in respect thereof, to take the buildings on the farm at the expiry of the lease, on a valuation not exceeding a certain sum. The landlord having died during the currency of the lease,—Held (aff. judgment of Lord Handyside, diss. Lord Curriehill) that the landlord's obligation transmitted against his general representatives, and that the executors were not entitled to a declaratory judgment as against the tenant, that the personal estate was not liable.

MR LACHLAN M'GILLIVRAY of Dunnaglass died in February 1852, leaving certain testamentary writings, under which the pursuers were appointed his executors. Mr M'Gillivray died possessed of considerable moveable property, and also of landed estates, to which there were various claimants, but the heirs-at-law or of provision being remote and uncertain, the Court appointed a judicial factor upon the estates. Thereafter Mr John M'Gillivray, having shewn right qua heir of succession to the lands of Aberchalder, these lands were withdrawn from the operation of the judicial factory. July 18, 1857.
1st Division.
Ld. Handyside
L.

In April 1851, Mr Lachlan M'Gillivray had entered into a lease of Aberchalder with Mr Masson for twelve years. By this lease, Mr Masson bound and obliged "himself and his foresaids (heirs, executors, and successors) to relieve the said John Lachlan M'Gillivray of, and pay to the outgoing tenant, any sum of money which he may be entitled to as meliorations for the houses on the said lands, and, in respect thereof, the said John Lachlan M'Gillivray binds and obliges himself and his foresaids (heirs and successors) to take the whole of the dwelling-houses, farm-offices, buildings, and dykes, on the said farm and lands at the expiry hereof, at the valuation of two neutral and competent persons to be mutually chosen, and to pay the amount of said valuation, not exceeding L.450 sterling, to the said James Masson and his foresaids."

The executors now raised this action against Mr Masson, Mr John M'Gillivray, and the judicial factor, to have it found and declared "that this obligation fell to be implemented, not by the pursuers as executors of the landlord, by whom the lease was granted, but by his heir in these lands, or other party in right thereof when the said obligation becomes exigible, and,

No. 245.
 —
 July 18, 1857.
 M'Gillivray's
 Executors v.
 Masson.

accordingly, that neither the defender James Masson, nor those succeeding to him in the said lease, have or can have any claim against the pursuers or the personal estate of the deceased in respect of said obligation, and that John M'Gillivray, as heir in possession of the lands, should be ordained for himself, his heirs and successors in said lands, to free and relieve the pursuers at the hands of the said James Masson and all others, of and from the said obligation, and all the consequences thereof."

The defender, Masson, pleaded;—That the landlord's obligation transmitted against the late Mr M'Gillivray's heirs in general, and, therefore, that the defender was entitled to be assoilzied from the conclusions of the summons. No defences were lodged by Mr John M'Gillivray.

The Lord Ordinary, on 27th June 1855, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"In respect no defences have been lodged nor appearance made for the defender John M'Gillivray, Esq., of Easter Aberchalder, decerns as concluded for so far as he is interested; but, as regards the defender James Masson, sustains the defences, assoilzies him from the conclusions of the libel in so far as directed against him, and decerns: Finds him entitled to expenses," &c. *

The pursuer reclaimed.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This case is in some respects novel. We must look not only to the relative position of the parties as executors of the late landlord and the

* "NOTE.—This is rather a singular case, and the Lord Ordinary regrets that he should feel himself compelled to pronounce the preceding interlocutor; but it humbly appears to him, that the very precise and comprehensive terms of the conclusions directed against the defender Masson permit of no other course. Acknowledging that such a stipulation as is contained in the defender's lease, in respect to meliorations to be paid by the landlord at its expiry, passes along with the lands, and is exigible from the heir succeeding to them or from the purchaser of the estate, the Lord Ordinary is still not prepared to hold that the obligation undertaken by the granter of the tack, binding himself and his heirs and successors in general terms, may not be made good, if need be, against his general representatives. Now, what the pursuers ask, as the executors of the granter of the tack, is declarator, not merely that the obligation falls to be implemented when it becomes exigible by the successor in the lands, or the party who may be in right of the estate, and not by the pursuers, as executors, but that neither Masson the defender, nor those succeeding to him in the lease, 'have or can have any claim against the pursuers, or the personal estate of the deceased, in respect of said obligation.' The Lord Ordinary does not think such a sweeping conclusion to be tenable, and is not aware of any authority to support it. It may be difficult to conceive circumstances which should make it necessary for the tenant to resort to a claim against the general representatives of his original landlord; but it is also impossible to say that the obligation is altogether valueless, and that under no imaginable circumstances could it be made available. At any rate, he is in possession of an obligation sufficiently broad to bind all who represent the late Mr M'Gillivray, and which he naturally refuses to discharge. Unless, therefore, it shall be held that the division of the inheritance of a landlord between his heir and executor shall forthwith discharge his representatives in moveables from all responsibility as to payments under such a stipulation in a lease, and limit the tenant's action solely against the heir in the lands, and, farther, that the sale of the estate, discharges all right in the tenant except against the purchaser, the Lord Ordinary does not see how the pursuers can prevail in this action. The Lord Ordinary cannot of himself venture to affirm these propositions. If the pursuers had limited their action to being found entitled to distribute the estate realised by them as executors, the Lord Ordinary thinks they might possibly have obtained decree to that effect, and so have attained their object as explained on record. But, as already noticed, their conclusion is to exclude the defender from any claim which he has or can have against the personal estate of the deceased, thus calling on him to renounce all claim against those who shall obtain the residuary estate."

tenant in the lands, but also to the nature of the obligation which the late landlord undertakes. There are some points settled as between the landlord and tenant in regard to a lease. The heir of the landlord taking the lands is bound in the prescriptions and stipulations of the lease, and so is a singular successor in regard to the proper matter of the lease. The cases of Arbuthnot, Fraser, and others settled that. On the other hand, the heir of the tenant is bound to fulfil the tenant's obligations, and so also an assignee who has been received by the landlord. It is, in fact, a bargain in this form of transaction, that the landlord accepts him in all respects in place of the previous tenant, all the liabilities attaching to the former tenant being transferred.

No. 245.

July 18, 1857.
M'Gillivray's
Executors v.
Masson.

Then, as to the effect of these changes, some points seem to be also clear,—for example, the landlord's heir is the party who is liable to the tenant, and so also the executors of a tenant are not liable in a question with the landlord. I think that is a matter settled on plain principle, because they derive no benefit from the lease: It is the heir of the party takes benefit from the lease. That point is settled law. So also, on the principle I have already alluded to, a cedent is not liable. But an assignee is taken in place of the cedent out and out. All these matters relate to proper stipulations as to land. In this case, it is not clear to my mind that the stipulation is of that kind. The executors here before the termination of the lease have brought an action of declarator to have it found that they will not in any event be liable to the tenant for the claim which he has against somebody in respect of meliorations, and they have obtained decree of relief against one of the defenders, who claims to be the heir of the landlord, and is alleged to be now the landlord. The question is, whether in this particular stipulation the tenant has now or can have any claim against the executors of the landlord. The incoming tenant undertakes to relieve the landlord of a debt owing by the landlord to the outgoing tenant. It was therefore a personal claim against the landlord which this tenant undertook to relieve him of, and in that state of matters I apprehend that it was in its own nature a claim which, if it was ever exigible at all, would, unless otherwise stipulated, be exigible against all the representatives of the landlord. In respect of that advance of money by the tenant for behoof of the landlord—for it was little else than that—the landlord obliges himself and his heirs and successors to take the whole of the buildings on the farm on a valuation, and to pay the amount of that valuation, not exceeding L.450, to the defender James Masson.

Now that is not necessarily a stipulation applicable to any operation that the tenant himself was to perform on these lands. There may be no such operations. It comprehends some advance for the landlord's convenience to the creditor of the landlord at the beginning of the lease, in so far at least as the present tenant has not himself by any mismanagement allowed the houses to become of less value than L.450. But it comprehends that sum.

That being the nature of the claim, it is not a claim arising from year to year in the course of the lease as part of the management of the estate, nor is it like the rents that effair to a fixed period of possession, which points out the interest of parties in reference to them. But it is a sum advanced by the tenant for the convenience of the landlord—in short, an accommodation at the beginning of the lease. I think the tenant had a claim against the landlord and his representatives from the time he made that advance. The simple view of the matter is, that it is a debt contracted by the landlord to the tenant, and that it still subsists. Circumstances may afterwards make the debt greater or less in amount, but the original debt continues, and the representatives of the landlord—whoever they are—are liable for it; therefore, I am for adhering to the interlocutor reclaimed against.

LORD IVORY.—I am of the same opinion, and on the same grounds.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—The view I take of this case is different from that which is embodied in the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and adopted by your Lordships.

The lease in question was entered into between the late Mr M'Gillivray and the defender Mr Masson, in 1851, for a period of twelve years thereafter; and by a condition of the contract, which has given rise to the present dispute, the latter engaged to relieve the former of any sum of money, to which the then outgoing tenant might be entitled as melioration for houses, and in respect thereof Mr M'Gillivray bound himself, his heirs and successors, to take the whole of the dwelling-houses, farm offices, buildings, and dykes on the farm at the expiry of the lease,

No. 245. at a valuation, and to pay the amount of such valuation, not exceeding L450, to the defender, and his heirs, executors, and successors.

July 18, 1857.
M'Gillivray's
Executors v.
Masson.

Mr M'Gillivray died in February 1852, during the first year of the lease, and the pursuers are his executors-nominate; and the question raised by this action is, whether these executors, although they may be entitled to demand from the defunct's heir relief from the obligation to pay for meliorations at the termination of the lease in the year 1863, remain liable to the defender for performance of that obligation?

According to my view of the case, it would be proper, before deciding this question, to ascertain whether the other defender John M'Gillivray, against whom the pursuers have obtained decree of relief as being the heir of the defunct, has truly that character. This is not admitted by the defender Masson, and I might not be prepared to hold the executors of the defunct to be free from liability for even the future obligations in the lease, if his true heir has not taken his place as his successor in the landlord's part of the contract. But as the interlocutor holds that the executors must remain liable for performance of the obligation for meliorations at the expiry of the lease, even on the assumption of such being the position of the defender John M'Gillivray, we must now deal with the question on that footing.

This question is one of great and general importance in this country, where the practice long has been, and continues to be, almost universal, to let lands by leases of considerable periods of endurance, and where in a large proportion of these leases it is expressly conditioned that the tenants at the expiry thereof shall be reimbursed their outlays on the houses and fences, in so far as the subjects of the leases shall then be found to be thereby ameliorated. A condition to this effect forms one of the general regulations for letting the farms of many of the large estates in Scotland; and, indeed, such a condition is implied by usage without being expressed, in leases of land in large provincial districts of the country, as appears from the report of the case of Bells v. Lamont, 14th June 1814.

As in very many cases the landlords die, or sell their estates, during the currency of such leases, it will probably be a startling announcement that the executors of these deceased landlords may be called upon to perform obligations of this kind at the terminations of the leases, however long a period may have lapsed since the entire right to the lands may have passed to the heirs or singular successors of such defuncts; and that, consequently, such executors are not in safety to distribute the executry funds until the termination of the period of endurance of every one of the leases which may have been granted on this footing by the defuncts. Yet such, as it appears to me, must be the consequence of the doctrine on which the interlocutor proceeds. The Lord Ordinary accordingly expresses his regret that he felt himself to be compelled to pronounce that interlocutor. But what, I ask, renders it necessary to adopt such a doctrine? Is it any precedent? or the authority of the institutional writers? or any general principle in the law of location, or of landlord and tenant? I can find nothing of the kind.

The defender has not referred us to any decision in support of this doctrine. Nor have any dicta of our institutional authorities been quoted as requiring or warranting the adoption of such a doctrine. It is not alleged to be founded on usage. And so far as I know, this doctrine, if it is now to be adopted, will be introduced for the first time into the practice of Scotland.

The only ground of the judgment, as appears from the note annexed to it, is this: That the granter of the lease, having bound himself, and his heirs and successors, to perform the obligation, it must be held, it is said, that it is binding on all his representatives after his death; that his executors or heirs in mobilibus, and his heir-at-law, are equally liable for its performance to the creditor in that obligation, whatever may be their claims of relief upon each other; and that the former class of obligants, as well as the latter, must remain bound to their creditor, whatever inconvenience this may create to the executors.

If this view of the question were sound, it would be strange that it should be such a novelty in the law and practice of the country, considering how constantly it must have been presenting itself in daily practice for some centuries. But in this reasoning there is overlooked an important element in our law of landlord and tenant,—namely, that the contract of location of heritable subjects between such parties is transmissible from the original contracting parties to their respective successors; and that, when such transmissions take place, the obligations in the contract are prestable,—not by or to the original contracting parties, or their legal representatives as such,—but by and to the parties who shall be in the respective positions of lessor or lessee, or landlord and tenant, at the dates when these obligations become prestable. In such cases, the transmission of the right either of the lessor or of the lessee, has the effect not only of rendering the successor directly liable for his author's obligations for the future possession, but also of liberating that author from liability for these obligations. This principle operates whether the successors of the contracting parties be their heirs-at-law or singular successors.

No. 245.

July 18, 1857.
M'Gillivray's
Executors v.
Masson.

Take, first, the case of the lessee or tenant. If he assign his right (which he may do if it be destined to assignees, or even without such a destination if the subject of the location be an urban tenement, or if the lease be for more than the ordinary period of endurance), then not only does the assignee become in his place the debtor in the obligations imposed by the contract upon the lessee or tenant, but, further, the cedent is ipso facto freed from such of these obligations as had not become prestable at the time of such transmission. When one obligant is thus substituted for another, the liability of the original obligant is held to be extinguished delegationem. He is still liable for payment of the rents, or performance of the obligations, which became prestable before the assignation, and while he was still in the position of being lessee or tenant, but not for those rents and obligations which were not prestable until after the assignation, and when he ceased to be in that position. This is trite law. See Skene v. Greenhill, 20th May 1825, F. C.

Or if the original lessee dies during the currency of the lease, and his heir-at-law succeeds to his right, he is of course liable for payment or performance of the obligations thereafter payable or prestable by the tenant; but he incurs this liability, not as representing passive the original lessor or tenant, but as having himself been the lessee or tenant. What proves this is, that if, after his succession, he assign the lease, even he, according to the rule just mentioned, is no longer liable for the future payments or prestations, the assignee alone being under such liability. And even if such heir of the original tenant retain his right to the lease, the executors of the defunct are not liable for such of the obligations in the lease as are prestable for the period subsequent to his death. In the case of Duke of Gordon v. Leslie, 8th March 1791, M. p. 5444, a landlord in such a case was held not only not to be a creditor of his deceased tenant's executors for such future rents, but not to be entitled even to retain, for payment of such rents, funds in his own hands, which belonged to the defunct.

Take next the case of a lessor or landlord. He is entitled to dispose of his part of the contract of location by alienating the property which is the subject of it. And when he does so, the donee, as the party to whom he transmits the subject, takes his place not only as direct creditor of the lessee in those obligations which are created in favour of the lessor, but also as direct obligant to the lessee in those obligations which are created in favour of the latter, in so far as such obligations are prestable posterior to the date of such transmission. In particular this is the case as to an obligation such as that in question, to pay to the lessee the value of meliorations on houses which may be left on the farm at the expiry of the lease. The case of Arbuthnot v. Colquhoun, 5th February 1772, Mor. p. 10424, is the leading authority on this point; and this also is now a trite rule of law. And the effect of such a transmission of the lessor's right is not only to render his successor liable for the payment or performance of such future obligations, but also to liberate himself from his obligation for the same. This is attended with no hardship to the lessee, as he is entitled to retain the value of such meliorations out of the rent becoming due by him at, and immediately before, the term when such meliorations are payable to him,—as was found in the case of Stewart v. M'Ra, and Stewart v. Campbell, both decided on 12th November 1834. And in such a case the lessee, while he has the security of such right of retention, in addition to the personal liability of the successor of the original lessor, is no longer in the position of being the creditor also of that original lessor. In the case of Morrison v. Patullo, 3d February 1787, Mor. p. 10425, a tenant under a lease, whereby it was conditioned that on his making certain erections on the farm he should be remunerated to the

No. 245. extent of L.50 by retaining that sum out of the rent payable to the landlord, made such erections between Martinmas 1783 and Whitsunday 1784, and claimed retention of the L.50 out of the rent which was payable by him at the latter term to the lessor, for crop 1783. But he was found to have no right to retain the sum from the rent so payable by him to the original lessor himself, because the latter had sold the property which was the subject of the lease, with entry to the purchaser at Martinmas 1783, being the term before the erection was made, and consequently before the allowance became exigible. And since in such a case the lessee has no right even to retain the funds in his hands belonging to the original lessor and obligant, in payment of the allowance for meliorations unquestionably due to him, still less has he a personal claim on that party for payment thereof. His only debtor is the party, who, as purchaser, is in the position of being the landlord at the time when the allowance becomes payable; and his right of retention was operative only out of the rents subsequently payable for that year to the purchaser.

July 18, 1857.
M'Gillivray's
Executors v.
Masson.

The principle which regulated all these different cases is, that when the right of either party to a contract of location of heritage is transmitted to another party either as his heir or his singular successor, not only is the successor directly liable to perform such of the obligations undertaken by his author as are to become due or prestatable, subsequent to the transmission, but the author and his general estate are liberated from liability for these obligations. And that principle, as it operates to liberate the executors of the lessee from liability for such obligations as become due or prestatable after his death, and after the lessee's right has been transmitted to his heir, must also operate to liberate the executors of the lessor from liability for such of the counter obligations as become due or prestatable after his death, and after the lessor's right has been transmitted to his heir. And accordingly this principle has operated to this effect in practice, there being, as already stated, no example of, nor authority for, the executors of a landlord being subjected in liability for a claim of meliorations at the expiry of a lease, when during its currency the granter has died, and his right has been transmitted to either his heir or a singular successor. And keeping in view the operation of this principle in the Scottish law of landlord and tenant, the difficulty is obviated which prevented the Lord Ordinary from arriving at what he avowedly felt to be the proper decision in this case.

It has been suggested that, even assuming the soundness of the views I have stated, they are rendered inapplicable to the present case by these specialties,—that the obligation in question is extrinsic to the contract of lease,—and that its import is, that the tenant should be reimbursed at the expiry of the lease an advance made by him for the landlord at its commencement, in satisfaction of a debt which was owing by the landlord to the former tenant, and which therefore was a burden on the landlord's executry. But, assuming the general rule to be as I have stated, this case cannot be excluded from its operation on either of these grounds.

The obligation on the lessor to indemnify the lessee for his outlays on the subject of the contract, in so far as these are in rem versum of the former, is an express condition of this contract of location. Such a condition is a very wise and equitable one, and, accordingly, it is very generally embodied in contracts of this class. At all events, the parties to the contract in question bargained on the footing of this condition being a part of their contract; and it must be held that all its conditions were adjusted on the footing of this being the case. And such a condition in a contract of lease passes not only in favour of a singular successor of the tenant, but also against a singular successor of the landlord. It is no answer to this, to say that the debt is not made a real burden on the lands; because the obligation to pay that debt is made an express condition of the contract of lease, and as such a contract is by statute made binding on a singular successor, he is liable to fulfil the conditions therein expressly imposed on the proprietor. In the case, accordingly, of Arbuthnot v. Colquhoun, while the Lord Ordinary assoilzied the purchaser from such a claim on the ground, inter alia, "that the clause in question, although contained in the contract of tack, is an obligation distinct from the contract of tack," the Court altered that judgment, and found the singular successor liable, holding, as the report states, "that this clause was effectual against a singular successor in the lands." And in the cases before mentioned of Stewart v. M'Ra. and Stewart v. Campbell, the right of the tenant to retain the rents owing by him in satisfaction of his claim for melioration under such a condition in the lease, was found to be preferable to the claims of even heritable creditors duly infeft in the lands. And hence this case cannot be excluded from the general rule on an assumption that the obligation in question is not a proper condition of the contract of lease. The case might perhaps be different if the obligation to pay meliorations were not one of the conditions of the written contract of lease itself, but the subject of a separate contract not made known to a singular successor, as happened in the case of M'Leod v. Bruce (Shaw's App. Cases, p. 213). But, in the present case, the obligation is an express condition of the written contract of lease itself.

No. 245.

July 18, 1857.
M'Gillivray's
Executors v.
Masson.

The other ground on which this case is supposed to be excepted from the general rule, appears to proceed on the assumption that the tenant is virtually in the position of an assignee to some claim of the preceding tenant for meliorations under the former lease, and that it is that claim which is to be satisfied by the landlord at the expiry of the existing lease. But this is not the case. We are not informed in the record what was the nature or extent of the claim of the former tenant; and the tack itself leaves it uncertain whether or not any such claim even existed; as it merely takes Mr Masson bound to relieve the landlord of "any sum of money which he (the outgoing tenant) may be entitled to as a melioration for the houses on the said lands." But, however that may be, the landlord's obligation to Mr Masson is—not to reimburse any such payment he might make at the expiry of the former lease—but to take off his hands at the expiry of his own lease, not only the whole of the dwelling-houses, but also the whole of the farm offices, buildings, and dykes, which might then be on the lands, and to pay their value as at that time, to the extent of L.450. The legal effect and operation of this condition of the lease are not rendered different from what they would otherways have been, merely because one of the counter conditions of that contract consists of this obligation of relief which was undertaken by the tenant.

Such being my views of this case, I cannot concur with your Lordships in affirming the interlocutor under review.

LORD DEAS.—This case raises a question of importance. But I agree with those of your Lordships who think the interlocutor ought to be adhered to.

The lease was granted in 1851, to endure for twelve years. The outgoing tenant had a claim against the landlord for meliorations on the buildings, which the incoming tenant undertook to pay on condition that the landlord should, at the expiry of his lease, reimburse him to the extent of what might then be the value of the buildings, not exceeding L.450. The landlord died in 1852; and in 1854 his executors instituted the present action against his heir and against the tenant, to have it found and declared that the obligation to pay for the buildings will fall exclusively on the heir or other party who may be in right of the lands when the obligation becomes exigible, and that no claim lies, or can lie, against the pursuers or the personal estate of the deceased. The heir (who is said to be in Canada) has entered no appearance, and has consequently been decerned against. But the tenant resists the action, and the Lord Ordinary has found him entitled to absolvitor.

To determine the question whether the tenant has been rightly assoilzied, it is not necessary to decide whether, in a question of relief, the heir or the executors will be ultimately liable. The heir is not raising that question, nor has the proper time for raising it arrived. The whole question at present is, can the tenant, in no event, have a claim against the executors? In my opinion he may, and this in respect of the plain terms of the contract by which the landlord bound himself, his heirs and successors (and consequently his executors) to implement the obligation. I see nothing in the nature of the obligation, or in the circumstances, to entitle one set of the granter's representatives to be instantly relieved from it more than another. I do not say that although an heir-at-law has entered into possession, and drawn the rents, the landlord's executors must nevertheless remain under every obligation undertaken by the landlord to the end of the lease. But in this matter we must distinguish. There are obligations incumbent respectively on landlord and tenant, inseparable from the nature of the right, such as the obligation to pay rent, on the one hand, and to maintain the tenant in possession, on the other; and it may very well be that the heir and the tenant, who assume towards

No. 245.
 —
 July 18, 1857.
 M'Gillivray's
 Executors v.
 Masson.

each other the relative position of landlord and tenant, may become alone responsible to each other in such obligations. Nor do I say that no course of dealing between the heir and the tenant will extend the same rule even to an obligation like the present. But there is no specialty of that sort alleged here. It is not even stated what has become of the past due rents—whether they have been paid to the judicial factor, or to the heir, although I assume that, if the heir has not got them, he is entitled to get them. The question arises upon the death of the landlord, while matters are still entire, and it relates to an obligation which appears to me to be peculiarly favourable for the plea of the tenant. For how does it arise? The landlord was owing a debt to the outgoing tenant. Instead of paying it himself, he got the incoming tenant to pay it—engaging to reimburse him at the end of the lease. Why should such an obligation not be binding on executors? Is it less a personal debt undertaken by the landlord because embodied in the contract of lease than if contained in a separate obligation? Would a personal bond be binding solely upon the heir if embodied in the contract of lease? I cannot take that view. We must look to the nature of the obligation irrespective of the contract into which it has been imported. It may be inconvenient for personal representatives to be burdened with an obligation not prestable for years. But the way to avoid that is for the landlord not to come under such an obligation, or for the executors to buy it off. The landlord may grant a lease without creating postponed claims of this kind easily enough. I am not sure that I appreciate the force of the remark, as bearing upon this question, that a lease is a mere personal contract. If it were so, the difficulty in holding the executors relieved would, I think, be all the greater. But a written lease, with a definite ish, is a real right, and not a mere personal contract. Such has been its character ever since the statute 1449, c. 18. Lord Stair, accordingly, treats of tacks (2. 9. 4.) “First, a personal rights. Secondly, as, by the statute, becoming real.” And he says (2. 9. 7), “As a tack becometh a real right, it must necessarily be clad with possession, and requireth no seisin, nor instrument, nor other solemnity.” In entail law accordingly all leases are regarded as, strictly speaking, alienations; and agricultural leases of ordinary endurance are held excepted only because they are necessary acts of administration. But obligations may be engrafted upon a lease (as upon any other deed) which are extrinsic to its character as a real right, and not even essential to its objects as a contract. Such obligations are not necessarily to be dealt with in the same manner with the proper and inherent subject matters of the tack. It is said there is no case affirming the liability of executors. But there is the express authority of Lord Braxfield in Taylor v. Bethune (1 Bell's 8vo Cases, p. 214), and there is no case or authority the other way. Lord Braxfield's opinion goes even to the executors' ultimate liability, and I am not to be understood to question its soundness to that extent, although it is not necessary to go into that point here. The case of Webster v. Farquhar, decided about the same time with the case of Taylor (Ibid, p. 207), and following the case of Blythwood, goes deep into the principle. It was there held that an obligation to pay at the end of the lease for houses built by the tenant was not prestable from the next heir of entail, but solely from the representatives of the granter of the lease, although the houses were quite necessary for the estate, and went to increase its value. Now this could only have been because the obligation was deemed extrinsic to the lease, for the heir in possession had full power to grant a lease with all clauses and obligations properly incidental to a lease. I am not moved by the cases of Arbuthnot, M. 10,424; Bell v. Lamont, 14th June 1814, F. C.; and Fraser, 2 Sh. Ap., 37; in which singular successors were held liable to the tenant in meliorations stipulated by the lease or due by the custom of the country. The rule is caveat emptor. Purchasers are bound to ascertain the terms of all current leases; and if they buy with postponed obligations patent on the face of the leases, or notorious by the custom of the country, it is no great stretch to hold that they have taken upon themselves these obligations. Whether the tenants must take the purchasers alone as their debtors may depend upon circumstances and the course of dealing which has followed upon the purchase. I do not see that that question was raised in any of the above cases. The tenants were contented with any one debtor sufficiently responsible, leaving sellers and buyers, as it is expressed in the report of Bell v. Lamont, “to settle their liability as they could.” The case of Bruce, 8th July 1822 (1 Sh. Ap. 218), illustrates the observation that it is the lease (which the purchaser is bound to know and is understood to adopt) that forms the connecting link between him and the tenant;—for it was there held that a separate known obligation, although it bound the purchaser to the seller, did not bind him to the tenant. That the heir of the tenant, “after being acknowledged by the landlord as tenant,” is alone liable for the rents of those years of which he reaps the crops, as was found in the case of the Duke of Gordon, 8th March 1791, M. 5444, does not in the least militate against the principle I am now going upon. Nor is that principle affected by the decision in the case of Skene, 20th May 1825, assuming it to be a sound decision. Its soundness has been questioned elsewhere, but I am not disposed to question it without full argument. If the landlord chooses to grant an agricultural lease in favour of assignees which by law would not pass to assignees (and therein differs from an urban lease and from every other deed or contract in which there is no delectus personarum), and afterwards recognises and accepts of the assignee as a sufficiently responsible tenant, I see, at present, nothing inconsistent with the rule affirmed in the cases of Millar (1 Macqueen, 345) and the Royal Bank of Scotland (Ib., 362), that contracts continue binding upon the contracting parties and their representatives, in holding (if the reasons for so holding be otherwise sufficient) that the landlord has no longer any claim against the original tenant. Of course, if this were otherwise, it would be all in favour of the result I arrive at in the present case. But that result does not require me to impugn the case of Skene, or to hold the judgments of the House of Lords in the cases of Millar and of the Royal Bank to be inconsistent with it; and I do not rest my opinion upon any such supposed inconsistency.

No. 245.

July 18, 1857.
Latta v.
Bremner.

THE COURT adhered, with additional expenses.

GRAHAM BINNY, W.S.—SANG & ADAM, S.S.C.—Agents.

JAMES LATTA, Petitioner.—Mackenzie.

ANDREW BREMNER, Respondent.—Munro.

No. 246.

Bankruptcy—Sequestration—Statutes 1 and 2 Vict. c. 118; 19 and 20 Vict. c. 79—Pension.—Held that a pension payable by the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury to a deceased Judge's clerk did not fall under the provisions of the Act 19 & 20 Vict. c. 79, sec. 149, by which provision is made for ordering payment of portions of salaries and pensions paid by certain departments of Government to the creditors of persons who may become insolvent.

THIS petition at the instance of the trustee on the sequestrated estate of the respondent was presented to the Lord Ordinary on the bills, for the purpose of obtaining in the manner pointed out in the 149th section of the Act 19 & 20 Victoria, cap. 79,* an order appointing part of an annuity of

July 18, 1857.
2^D DIVISION.

* By the 149th section of the Bankruptcy Scotland Act, 1856, it is enacted, that “The Lord Ordinary or Sheriff may order such portion of the pay, half-pay, salary, emolument, or pension of any bankrupt, as on communication from the Lord Ordinary or Sheriff to the Secretary of War, or the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, or the Commissioners of the Customs or Excise, or the chief officers of the department to which such bankrupt may belong, or may have belonged, or under which such pay, half-pay, salary, emolument, or pension may be enjoyed by such bankrupt, or to the Court of Directors of the East India Company, they respectively may, under their hands, or under the hand of their respective chief secretary or other chief officer for the time being, consent to in writing, to be paid to the trustee, in order that the same may be applied in payment of the debts of such bankrupt; and such order and consent being lodged in the office of Her Majesty's Paymaster-General, or of the Secretary of the said Court of Directors, or of any other officer or persons appointed to pay or paying any such half-pay, salary, emolument, or pension, such portion of the said pay, half-pay, salary, emolument, or pension as shall be specified in such order and consent, shall be paid to such trustee until the Lord Ordinary or Sheriff shall make order to the contrary.”

No. 246. L.100 per annum, paid by the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury to the respondent, in the capacity of the clerk of a deceased Judge in the Court of Session, to be paid to the trustee for behoof of his creditors.

July 18, 1857.
Latta v.
Bremner.

The application was resisted on the ground that it was uncalled for in the circumstances of the bankrupt, who was 67 years of age, the father of two young children, his wife being in very delicate health, requiring constant medical attendance. The only fund she possessed, exclusive of his jus mariti, yielded little more than L.20 per annum. It was, besides, argued that the section of the statute on which the application was founded did not authorise any such order as was asked for, where the pension was paid by the Lords of the Treasury. The purpose of the Act clearly was to give power to the different departments of Government to consent that the pay of their officers or servants should suffer a deduction for the benefit of their creditors. That the respondent held his office from and at the pleasure of a Lord of Session; he had not been in the employment of, and did not receive his pension from any of the boards enumerated, or from any department of Government, the same being payable out of funds accumulated and set apart for certain special purposes in terms of the Act 1st and 2d Vict., c. 118; and though the same was paid by the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury, they were merely trustees appointed to administer the fund, and the respondent was not an officer appointed by or enjoying emolument of or under the Treasury. That the statute of 19 and 20 Vict., c. 79, manifestly referred to persons under the controul or in the service of state departments, and it was not intended to give any control to such departments not previously possessed by them.

The Lord Ordinary reported the point. It was argued for the petitioner;—The statute of 19 and 20 Vict., c. 79, sec. 149, clearly was intended to apply to all salaries paid by the Treasury, which was a department of Government, and the Lords Commissioners were as clearly comprehended under the words “the chief officers of the department,” as would be the Postmaster General. This provision was borrowed from the analogous provision of the Insolvent Debtors Act in England, under which the practice was in favour of the petitioner.¹

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I do not enter into the question of what may have been the reason for leaving out the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury in the enumeration in the statute. I think the words “any department” are intended to include the departments enumerated, or any analogous department, but cannot comprehend the Commissioners of the Treasury.

THE COURT refused the petition.

ROBERT AINSLIE, W.S.—SMITH & KINNEAR, W.S.—Agents.

¹ Grindsell, 3d Sept. 1849, Insolvent Court, xiii. Law Times, p. 548.

CASES

DECIDED IN

THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

1856-7.

SIR ROBERT MENZIES, Bart., Pursuer and Appellant.—Sol.-Gen. Sir R. Bethell—Sir Fitzroy Kelly—Rolt, Q.C.—Anderson, Q.C. LIEUTENANT-GENERAL MACDONALD, Defender and Respondent.—Lord-Adv. Moncreiff—Roundell Palmer, Q.C.	No. 1. <hr style="width: 10%; margin: 5px auto;"/> June 10, 1856. Menzies v. Macdonald.
---	---

Property—Loch—Common Property—Disposnee.—Two proprietors had a joint right or common property in a loch;—Held, that one could dispose part of his lands, and communicate to the dispoinee a common right in the loch; and that the other proprietor had no right to interfere, provided the dispoinee and his author together did not exercise their right of property in the loch beyond the extent to which the dispooner was entitled to have exercised his right.

Division.—Opinion, that there is no reason why co-proprietors of a loch should not have it divided.

(In the Court of Session, 10th March 1854. Ante, vol. xvi. p. 827.) Lord Cranworth, C.

Sir Robert Menzies was proprietor of the barony of Rannoch. His titles contained an express grant of the loch of that name. Robertson of Strowan was proprietor of the barony of Strowan, comprehending “omnes et singulas terras, molendina, silvas, piscationes, lacus, aliaque particulariter subscripta;” and in a judgment pronounced in 1799, in conjoined declarators, at the instance of the proprietors of the two estates, it was found that they “have a joint right or common property in the loch of Rannoch, and a joint right of” “exercising all acts of property thereupon.”

In 1828 Robertson sold a part of the barony of Strowan, called Kinloch, to General Macdonald, in whose disposition the lands were described as “All and whole the five-merk lands of Kinloch, of old extent, with castles, towers, fishings, lakes, forests, and pertinents of the same.”

In an action at the instance of Sir Robert Menzies, the Court of Session held that these words conveyed to General Macdonald a right of common property in the loch.

The appellant contended;—(1.) That the ownership of the lake was a jus individuum, incapable of severance; and that, where there are two joint proprietors of such a right, one could not without the other's consent introduce a third. (2.) That, at all events, the conveyance by Strowan to Macdonald was not conceived in terms fitted to carry such a right.

No. 1. The Lord Chancellor moved that the judgment of the Court below should be affirmed. He was aware of nothing in the law of Scotland to prevent the owner of a loch, whether he possessed it under direct grant, or as part and pertinent, from alienating any portion of it he might think fit. If alienation by one co-proprietor led to any limitation of the other's full enjoyment of his moiety, that would entitle him to take steps for having the use of the lake regulated, a right he would have even if there were no alienation. Neither co-proprietor could, by alienating, give away more than his own share; but if he kept within that limit, the other co-proprietor had no right to complain. It was admitted in argument that the right to the lake must have been divided, in the event of the estate going to heirs-portioners. The right of alienating, in whole or in part, was an incident of property generally, and attached equally to a lake and a muir. With regard to the second branch of the argument, his Lordship's opinion was, that the judgment of 1798 had fixed Strowan's right to the use of the loch; that the description in his conveyance of Kinloch was substantially the same as that in his own charter; therefore, that General Macdonald, as disponent of part of the barony, got as pertinent thereto the same right to the loch in respect of the lands of Kinloch, which Strowan previously had in respect of the whole barony."

APPEAL dismissed, with costs.

No. 2. THE MAGISTRATES OF RENFREW, Appellants.—Sol.-Gen. Sir R. Bethell—Anderson.

JAMES WARD HOBY AND OTHERS, Respondents.—Rolt.

Appeal—Competency—Expenses.—Where the presiding Judge at a jury trial "of consent discharged the jury without a verdict, and in order that the case might be decided by the Court upon the notes," appeal against the judgment of the Court dismissed as incompetent, on the ground that it must be looked upon as a verdict by the jury. The House of Lords remitted to the appeal committee to decide who should pay the costs of discussing the competency of an appeal.

June 12, 1856. (IN the Court of Session, January 18, 1854, ante, vol. xvi. p. 348.)
Lord Cranworth, C. The question was, whether the Magistrates of Renfrew had right to levy certain harbour dues from the defenders at a certain pier, and an issue was sent to trial, whether they had, under a certain royal "charter (dated 1703), levied a duty of twopence per ton upon goods loaded or landed within the bounds of their grant." After evidence had been led, the case was withdrawn from the jury in terms of the following entry in the notes of the presiding Judge, the Lord Justice-Clerk:—"In respect that, at this stage of the trial, both parties concurred in the view that there was no proper question of fact which the jury could be called upon to decide, the Lord Justice-Clerk, with the consent and at the desire of the parties, discharged the jury without a verdict; and in order that the cause might be decided by the Court upon the notes, each party being entitled to raise any question of law which the notes and record suggest."

The Court thereafter, on 18th January 1854, "Having heard parties' procurators on the questions of law raised by them on the notes of the

be taken at the trial, and reserved for the Court,—Find that the No. 2.
 owed of twopence per ton on goods loaded or landed," &c., " was June 16, 1856.
 law a levy of proper harbour dues by the burgh of Renfrew, in Caledonian of the charter of 1703," " and therefore find that such levy cannot Railway Co. v.
 by warrant for the exaction," &c.; and assoilzied the defenders. Sprot.

Magistrates of Renfrew having appealed, the defenders presented on, stating that the case had been withdrawn from the Jury Court ert of Session, and referred to the Judges of the Second Division, trators; that the appeal against their interlocutor was therefore etent, and praying therefore for its dismissal, with costs. The committee reported that they thought the question of competency be argued at the bar.

Lord Chancellor remarked,—“ The only distinction attempted to be etween this case and that of Dudgeon v. Thomson (ante, vol. xvii.
 . p. 22) is, that the learned Judges in their finding say, that they point of law. If the jury had said, “ We find in point of law that not a levy in pursuance of the charter,” that would not have made n truth a finding in point of fact, and not of law. It is not a queslaw at all. The question to be decided was one of fact, whether uance of the charter the dues had been levied? That being the to be decided by the jury, the parties agreed that it should be ed to the Judges. The Judges found that the dues were not levied uance of the charter, and then no doubt all matter of law is
 d. What would be the consequence of those tolls having been if not in pursuance of the charter, is an open question; but the n, whether the Judges properly came to that conclusion? is a quesich is not open, but which must be taken to have been found by y, although not found by the jury, but the Judges.”

THE appeal was dismissed as incompetent, and the question of costs was referred to the Appeal Committee.

CALEDONIAN RAILWAY COMPANY, Defenders and Appellants.—

No. 3.

Sir F. Kelly, Q.C.—Rolt, Q.C.—Anderson, Q.C.

K SPROT, Pursuer and Respondent.—Sol.-Gen. Sir R. Bethell—

R. Palmer, Q.C.—Broun.

—*Reservation of minerals—Clause—Statutes 7 Geo. IV. c. 103; 9 &
 . c. 329 (Garnkirk and Caledonian Railways Acts); 8 & 9 Vict. c. 19 Clauses Act); 8 & 9 Vict. c. 33 (Railway Clauses Act).—A proprietor
 d to a railway company, reserving the minerals and liberty to work them. e proposed to exercise this right, the Company objected, on the ground, lly true in point of fact, that it could not be done compatibly with the safety
 ne. Held (reversing the judgment of the Court of Session), that the passing General Railway Acts subsequent to the date of the conveyance did not enlarge rior's rights, and that he was neither entitled to work the minerals nor to ation for their loss, as in every conveyance of surface there was at common implied conveyance of a right to a subjacent and adjacent support adequate urpose for which the surface was conveyed, and the reservation could only r as the working could be carried on consistently with the grant.
 ion.—That, as the surface was sold for the construction of a railway, it*

No. 3. made no difference that it had been transferred to a company on whose line the traffic was much greater than had been contemplated at the time of the original transaction.
 June 16, 1856.
 Caledonian
 Railway Co. v.
 Sprot.

(SEE ante, vol. xvi. pp. 559, 955.)

Lord Cran-
 worth, C.
 Ld. Brougham

The Garnkirk and Glasgow Railway was constructed under the Act 7 Geo. IV. c. 103, and two subsequent Acts of the same reign, which empowered the Railway Company to appropriate such lands as should be necessary, on making compensation to the proprietors. By section 11, owners had power to reserve the minerals; which, however, were not to be wrought without good security being found for any loss or damage to the Railway occasioned by the working of them. By section 89th, it was provided that, if at any time any person should sustain damage by the execution of the powers given by the statute, and for which no remedy was therein provided, in such a case the recompense for such damage should "from time to time" be so settled and ascertained in such manner as was directed in respect of any other recompense specified in the Act. The Railway passed through the lands of Garnkirk, the property of Mr Sprot, the respondent in the appeal. The ground necessary for their works, extending thirty feet on each side of the Railway, was taken by the Company; and in consideration of a sum of L.624, made up of several items, none of which was specific compensation for mines or minerals, Sprot executed a conveyance of the ground taken, "reserving the whole mines and minerals of whatever description within the said lands hereby conveyed, and full power and liberty to us, or any person or persons authorised by us, to search for, work, win, and carry away the same," &c. By subsequent statutes the Company were empowered to extend their line of railway, and call it the "Glasgow, Garnkirk, and Coatbridge Railway," and to alter and widen the gauge of the Railway, so as to unite it with other lines, and under the Act 9 & 10 Vict. c. 329, the line was transferred to the Caledonian Railway Company.

There exists in the lands of Garnkirk a field of fireclay, lying under and on both sides of the ground occupied by the railway; the clay and other minerals were being worked by Mr Sprot, when an engineer's report was transmitted to him, stating that the workings could not be carried on within sixty feet of the railway without endangering its safety. He sometime after gave notice to the Railway Company, in terms of 8 & 9 Vict. c. 33, sect. 71, that he intended to work the minerals under the railway; to which they replied, that they did not object to his doing so, as soon as security was given that the railway would not thereby be injured. He then raised this action, concluding for declarator that he had right to work the minerals under and adjacent to the railway, unless the Company agreed to purchase them, or compensate him for his loss through leaving them unwrought, and for damages for having been compelled to leave them unwrought for some time. The Court, altering the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, found that the pursuer had reserved the minerals in and adjacent to the lands disposed to the Railway Company, with full power to work them, under the reservations specified in the conveyance, and expressed in the statute 7 Geo. IV. c. 103. That in the circumstances it was not incumbent on the pursuer to find security to the defenders before working any of the minerals reserved by his conveyance, or the adjacent minerals, and that he was entitled to work these minerals, subject only to the provisions of the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, and Lands Clauses Consolidation Act—which Acts enable railway companies, if they object to mining, to prevent it by purchasing the mines, or compensating landlords for their loss in not working them.

No. 3.

June 16, 1856.
Caledonian
Railway Co. v.
Sprot.

The Lord Chancellor moved that the judgment be reversed, reading an opinion in which Lord Brougham concurred. His Lordship remarked,—In the conveyance of the ground for the purpose of constructing a railway, though under reservation of mines and minerals, and liberty to work them, a right to all reasonable subjacent and adjacent support was necessarily implied, and rested on grounds common to the Scotch and to every other system of jurisdiction; just as under a conveyance of the upper story of a house, reserving all below the upper story, the purchaser would have right to prevent the owner of the lower stories from interfering with the walls and beams on which the upper story rests. If, while the Acts of Geo. IV. were the only Acts in force, Mr Sprot had proceeded to work the mines, he was bound to have done so in such a way as would not have interfered with his implied warranty; and if he found he could not win the minerals because his doing so would interfere with the necessary support of the railway, he had no more right to complain, than if he was prevented by being unable to do so without sinking a shaft in the middle of the railway; that is, in the land actually conveyed. The inability to win minerals under the lands conveyed to the railway was not a new damage arising out of the execution of the company's powers, but one arising out of the obligation implied in his conveyance, which he was bound to consider at settlement of the price paid for his lands, in calculating which, the circumstance that he was to convey not merely the surface, but an implied right to support for the land disposed, must be held to have been necessarily taken into account.

There were several statutes passed subsequent to the date of the conveyance by Mr Sprot, but it appeared from an examination of them that the rights acquired by the original company, by virtue of Mr Sprot's conveyance, remained unaffected up to the time of their final transfer to the Caledonian Company. The Judges of the First Division, his Lordship thought, had overlooked, or not given due weight to the effect of the conveyance of 1834.

That the traffic on the railway originally contemplated would not have equalled the present traffic, did not affect the case.*

INTERLOCUTORS of Inner-House reversed, and that of the Lord Ordinary affirmed.

* CALEDONIAN RAILWAY CO. v. LORD BELHAVEN.

June 5, 1857.

IN this case the Court of Session, on the same grounds on which they had decided the case of Sprot, refused to interdict the Earl of Belhaven from working mines and minerals under the line without at first giving security.

Lord Cranworth, C.
Lord Wensleydale.

The Lord Cranworth and Lord Wensleydale were of opinion that this case was leydale.

No. 4. THE CALEDONIAN AND DUMBARTONSHIRE RAILWAY COMPANY, Defenders and Appellants.—Sol.-Gen. Sir R. Bethell—R. Palmer, Q.C.

June 19, 1856.
Caledonian &
Dumbarton-shire Railway
Co. v. Helensburgh Harbour Trustees.

THE TRUSTEES OF HARBOUR OF HELENSBURGH AND SIR JAMES COLQUHOUN, Pursuers and Respondents.—Sir F. Kelly—Anderson, Q.C.

Railway—Joint-Stock company—Obligation by projectors of a company—A committee of the projectors of a railway agreed to erect a quay, &c., to be vested in the magistrates of a burgh. The magistrates, on the other hand, agreed to support the undertaking, and give certain facilities for carrying the railway through the burgh. The agreement was not embodied in the Act of Parliament. Held (reversing the judgment of the Court of Session), that the railway company was not bound by the agreement of its projectors to apply their funds to a purpose not sanctioned by the statute incorporating the company.

Lord Cran-
worth, C.
Ld. Brougham

(In the Court of Session, 2d Dec. 1852. Ante, vol. xv. p. 148.)

A quorum of the Committee of Management of the then projected railway called the Caledonian and Dumbartonshire Railway, in 1846 entered into an agreement with the Magistrates of Helensburgh and Sir James Colquhoun, the superior of the burgh, whereby, in consideration of the Magistrates supporting an application for an Act of Parliament for the formation of the railway, and permitting rails to be laid through certain streets to the harbour and a quay which the Magistrates were going to apply for powers to erect, the committee of management undertook that the Railway Company should defray the cost of obtaining the Act and of erecting the quay,—L.3000 of the expense to be a burden on the quay. In May 1846, the Act was passed for making the quay and harbour, which was vested in the Magistrates, and in June following the Railway Company obtained their Act, which sanctioned a branch to Helensburgh from their main line. The Railway Company did not proceed to form the Helensburgh branch. The Magistrates and Sir James Colquhoun raised this action, concluding for declarator, that the agreement made by the committee of the projectors of the railway was binding on the Company; that the Company should be decerned to implement the same, and specially should be decerned to repay to the pursuers the expense of preparing for and procuring their Act of Parliament; and also of the expense already incurred, and to be incurred, in erecting the harbour, &c., L.3000 always remaining a burden on it.

The Court, adhering to the Lord Ordinary's judgment, decerned in favour of the pursuers. The defenders appealed.

The Lord Chancellor moved, with concurrence of Lord Brougham, that the judgment be reversed, remarking, that agreements made by the projectors of an undertaking did not bind the Company afterwards empowered by statute, unless such agreements were embodied in the statute. The legislature, providing for the public advantage, could only be held to sanction what was contained in the statute. Giving effect to agreements as bind-all fours with that of Sprot, except that here the Banking Company were moving as pursuers, whereas they were defenders in the previous action, in conformity with the principles laid down in which ing on shareholders, which were not embodied in the Act, might be admitting a fraud upon Parliament, who might not have sanctioned the undertaking on such conditions. The fact that committees of both Houses of Parliament frequently did not require agreements brought under their notice to be embodied in the Act, could not affect the legal import of the Act when passed. Capitalists, when investing their money in the stock of a railway, were entitled to rely upon the funds being devoted strictly to purposes within the Act. If secret terms were to be held binding on those who took shares, the result might be ruinous to those who acted on the faith of the legislative incorporation.

THE INTERLOCUTORS appealed against were reversed.

No. 4.
July 15, 1856.
Cuming v. Boswell.

A committee of management could not be considered as agents for the Company owing its existence to their exertions, to the effect of binding the Company to fulfil contracts. Neither was a railway company, when established by Act of Parliament, in substance though not in form a body succeeding to the rights and coming into the place of the projectors—a principle clearly held by Lord Cottenham in deciding Edwards v. the Grand Junction Railway Company (1 Railway Cases, p. 173), Stanley v. the Chester and Birkenhead Railway Company (1 Railway Cases, p. 58), and Lord Petre v. the Eastern Counties Railway Company (1 Railway Cases, p. 462). But although that doctrine was held in these cases, the circumstances were different from those in the present one, which they could not therefore be held to rule. In all of them the agreement founded on, though not incorporated in the Act, had regard to something the doing of which fell within the powers and objects of the Act. But in this case the projectors agreed to advance funds to build a harbour and quay—objects entirely beyond those for which the Company was incorporated, and to carry out which the shareholders subscribed. The effect of the judgment in the Court below “is to compel the appellants to do an act which they have no authority to do, in performance of a contract entered into not by themselves, but by others who had no authority to bind them.”

THE appeal was sustained, the interlocutor of the Court of Session reversed, and the appellants assolizied, with expenses in the Court below.

The Hon. Mrs JANE LESLIE CUMING, Claimant.—Sol.-Gen. Sir R. Bethell No. 5.
—Rolt, Q.C.

Mrs J. D. BOSWELL, Claimant.—Lord.-Adv. Moncreiff—R. Palmer, Q.C.

Trust—Vesting—Substitution—Conditional institute—Accumulation of annual profits—Bank stock—Bonus.—On the construction of a trust-deed, Held (affirming judgment of Court of Session), 1. That on the death of the institute without issue, the whole residue of the trust-estate went to an heir-female, not to the institute's representatives; 2. That accumulations of annual proceeds, including interest and bonuses on bank stock, during the institute's minority (he having survived majority), did not fall under the term “residue,” they having been the absolute property of the grandson, and now going to his representatives.

(In Court of Session, 27th Jan. 1852, ante, vol. xiv, p. 363.)

July 15, 1856.

The clauses on which the first branch of the case depended will be found quoted ad longum in the Court of Session report. The clause on which the second point turned, was an instruction by the truster to his trustees

Lord Cranworth, C.

No. 5. "to lay out and employ the residue" of his estate "for the use and behoof of George Cuming, and the heirs of his body," "in such way as may seem most expedient to them, till he or they may arrive at majority, when they are to denude thereof." George Cuming attained majority, but when he died the trustees had not denuded.

July 18, 1856.
Hutchison v.
Skelton.

It was remarked, That the testator meant to say that the grandson was to be the person entitled, though he was not to claim possession from his trustees till he attained majority. The trustees were in the meantime to manage his property for him. That was a postponement for convenience, from his want of capacity as a minor to manage his property, but he did not mean at all to interfere with his right and interest which should then accrue.

The judgment in regard to the bonuses did not interfere with the English rule, that such profits must be added to capital, and do not go to tenants for life, which was also the rule in Scotland, as settled in Irvine v. Howie. But that was the case of a liferenter. Here the person entitled was absolute fiar. He was no more a liferenter during minority than after majority. After attaining 21 he became entitled in his own right; before that age others were entitled as his trustees, and with the same incidents as would have attached to him had he been of age. Among these bonuses must be reckoned.

No. 6. ROBERT HUTCHISON AND OTHERS, Appellants.—Sol.-Gen. Sir R. Bethell—Rolt.

SKELTON AND OTHERS, Respondents.—Sir Fitzroy Kelly—Munro.

Testament—Construction—Fee and Liferent—Discharge.—A testator directed his trustees to set apart L.1500 for each of his daughters in liferent, and their children respectively in fee; but provided that any sums already paid at the date of the settlement, or that he might afterwards pay to any of them, should be held as paid to account of the above provision. The residue of the estate was to be divided equally among the sons. One daughter predeceased her father, leaving issue. She had, before the date of the settlement, received from him L.1000, for which she granted receipt as "in part of patrimony;"—Held (reversing judgment of Court of Session), that the children were entitled to the L.1500, only under deduction of the L.1000.

July 18, 1856. (In Court of Session, 18th March 1853, ante, vol. xv. p. 570).

Lord Cranworth, C.

John Hutchison, in a settlement executed in 1840, directed his trustees as follows:—"That they shall set apart and secure to each of my daughters Mary, A, B, C, and D, in liferent, and their children respectively in fee, the sum of L.1500 sterling," but always under the provision that it should be strictly alimentary, &c., "that they shall pay and divide the free remainder and residue of my estate amongst my sons, equally between them, share and share alike; it being understood, and hereby specially provided and declared, that whatever sum or sums have been already paid, or may in lifetime hereafter be paid to any or either of my said children, whether sons or daughters, and vouched by receipt or other written document, or entered to their debit in my ledger or other account-book, shall be held and accounted as so much of the provision falling to such child or children under this deed of settlement," &c. In 1823 the testator's daughter Mary had married, and he had settled L.1000 on her and her heirs and assignees whomsoever, and for this sum she had granted a receipt as "to account, or in part of patrimony." The sum was also entered in her father's books as advanced to her. She died in 1837; the testator in 1843. In the division of the estate the residuary legatees claimed that from the L.1500 legacy to Mary and her issue, L.1000 should be deducted. On behalf of the children, it was maintained that a separate interest had been created in their favour in the legacy of L.1500, which could not be affected by the payment to their mother, and this view was adopted in the Court of Session.

No. 6.

July 29, 1856.
Dixon v.
Bovill.

The residuary legatees appealed.

In giving judgment the Lord Chancellor remarked,—“Is the sum of L.1000 advanced to Mary on her marriage to be taken in reduction of the L.1500, or is it not? The Court below decided that it was not; because, they said, that that was to be deducted from her life interest, and not from the ultimate interest of the children.” She was herself dead, so that in her case there would be no deduction. But the same principle would apply to the other daughters. Now, in the first place, it is obvious that the intention of this will was to give equal legacies to all the daughters, and equal shares of the residue to all the sons. But the intention of giving equal legacies to the daughters would be defeated by the construction which has been adopted by the Court below; because, if there had been any daughter to whom L.1500 had been advanced in her lifetime, the consequence would be that eventually that daughter's family would take L.3000. But further, how is the gross sum which has been advanced in the lifetime to be apportioned and set apart against the life interest in the legacy given by the will? The whole arrangement would be so extremely inconvenient, that if there be any other possible construction that will not militate against the language used by the testator, I think it is the duty of the Court to arrive at such a construction. I think that suggested for the appellants is perfectly rational construction. The testator calls it “the provision falling to such child or children.” If a man by his will gives L.1500 for his child to have the benefit of it during his life, and afterwards to go to her children, she being a married woman with a family, is not that legitimately described as a provision falling to children? It appears to me clear that it is so.”

INTERLOCUTOR reversed.

WILLIAM DIXON AND ANOTHER, Defenders and Appellants.—Sir Fitzroy Kelley—Rolt. No. 7.

GEORGE HINTON BOVILL AND OTHERS, Pursuers and Respondents.—Sol.-Gen. Sir R. Bethell—Anderson—Bovill.

Competency of appeal.—This case had been sent to a jury. At the trial no parole evidence was offered, and the following minute appeared on the Judge's

No. 7. notes :—“ In respect that the parties concur in holding that there is no question of fact on which the opinion of the jury could be taken, and that the case on the facts, as now proved, turns wholly on questions of law for the Court, the Lord Justice-Clerk discharged the jury in order that parties may bring the whole case before the Court for judgment, each party being entitled to state any questions of law which the facts raise ;”—Held, that the judgment ultimately pronounced by the Court of Session was subject to appeal.

July 29, 1856.
Dixon v.
Bovill.

Writ in re mercatoria—Scrip-note—An obligation to deliver iron blank in the name of the creditor ;—Held (reversing judgment of Court of Session), (1.) to be invalid in the hands of a third party ; but, (2.) that by virtue of correspondence between the third party and the ironmaster, the latter had become liable to deliver the iron to the third party, in terms of the document.

Lord Cran-
worth, C.

(In the Court of Session, 21st Feb. 1854, ante, vol. xvi. p. 619).

Smith & Sons purchased 1000 tons of iron from Dixon, and in exchange for a bill for the price, received a delivery note in these terms :—“ 10th July 1854.—I will deliver 1000 tons pig-iron when required after 10th September next, to the party lodging this document with me.” Thereafter, Smith & Sons sold to Balls & Son. Balls & Son having experienced some difficulty in getting delivery of the iron, a good deal of correspondence took place between them and Dixon, in the course of which Dixon wrote to them on 4th September,—“ Messrs Smith & Son purchased the 1000 tons pig-iron, as I understood, for their own use, and on the undertaking being lodged with me, I will ship the iron, as required, in the usual way.”

Before the iron was delivered, Smith and Son became bankrupt, and their bill not having been paid, Dixon refused to deliver the iron, pleading retention as against Smith and Son—contending that the iron delivery note was invalid in itself, and at all events could not pass by indorsation. These pleas were repelled. Dixon carried the case by appeal to the House of Lords, who, after disposing of the question of competency noticed in the rubric, heard the case on the merits.

The Lord Chancellor, in giving judgment, remarked, “ If the question had turned exclusively upon the validity or invalidity of this document, I am bound to say that I should not have concurred with the Court of Session. I think that the document is invalid. The effect of such a document, if valid, is to give a floating right of action to any person who may become possessed of it.” “ No evidence was given to shew any general mercantile usage affecting such instruments as that now in question,” “ there is nothing in the law merchant to warrant what is now contended for.” Bills of lading afford no analogy whatever. They are mere symbols of property. “ No right of action passed by indorsement previously to the Act 18 and 19 Vict., c. 111.” “ Independently of the law merchant and of positive statute, within neither of which classes do these scrip-notes range themselves, the law does not, either in Scotland or in England, enable any man by a written engagement to give a floating right of action at the suit of any one into whose hands the writing may come, and who may thus acquire a right of action better than the right of him under whom he derives title.”

But on a view of the dealing and correspondence between Dixon and Balls and Son, his Lordship was of opinion that the Court was perfectly right in adopting the view that there had been a clear adoption by Dixon of Balls and Son as the parties to whom he undertook to deliver the iron, and to whom he did deliver some. He entered into a distinct engagement—his Lordship specially founded on the letter of 4th September—that he will hold the iron disposable to the order of Balls and Son. No. 7.

July 29, 1856.
Mackenzie v. Dunlop.

It was found that, by virtue of the correspondence, Dixon became liable to deliver the 1000 tons of iron to Balls and Son, and therefore appeal dismissed with costs.

JAMES MACKENZIE, Pursuer, Appellant.—Lord-Adv. Moncreiff—Sir Fitzroy Kelly.

No. 8.

DUNLOP, WILSON, AND COMPANY, Defenders, Respondents.—Rolt—Blackburn.

Proof—Usage of trade—Iron scrip.—The holder of an iron scrip-note having demanded delivery of iron manufactured at a foundry not specified on the face of it;—Held, 1. That it was incompetent to prove that the scrip had been issued to the party from whom the holder had purchased, in fulfilment of an obligation to deliver iron of the said manufacture; 2. (Alt. opinion of Court of Session) That it was competent to prove that, “according to the true construction of the notes, the iron mentioned can, according to the usage of the trade, be said ex facie to mean iron of the species demanded;” 3. That as general usage of trade can be proved only by multiplication of particular usages, it was competent to prove that parties dealing with the defenders understood their scrip-notes to imply an obligation to deliver iron of the species called for; although, 4, (aff. opinion of Court of Session), Evidence of such particular course of dealing on the part of the issuers of the scrip could not in law suffice to control the terms of the note.

Process—Jury trial—Verdict—Record.—It is incompetent to support a motion for a new trial on objections to the formality of proceedings at a jury trial which do not appear from the Judge’s notes.

A jury having returned a verdict for the pursuer, but with power to the Court to enter up the verdict for the defenders, and to give judgment in the cause if the Court shall be of opinion,” &c. &c.—Observed, that the jury had no power to return such a verdict except of consent, but that, although the record did not bear “of consent,” and counsel at the bar denied having given such consent, it must be assumed that it had been given.

(In the Court of Session, 7th Dec. 1853, ante, vol. xvi. p. 129).

July 29, 1856.

In this case the pursuers moved for a rule on the defenders to shew cause why there should be a new trial, “in respect that the verdict, as it appears on the notes of the Judge furnished to the parties, was not declared by the chancellor or foreman of the jury in open court, and taken down by the clerk of the said court before the jury was discharged.”—The motion was refused. The pursuers appealed, but the judgment was affirmed, the Lord Chancellor remarking, that that question could not be entered into, the Court being bound to take the record as they find it, “therefore that matter is entirely out of the case.” Lord Cranworth, C.

The notes of the presiding Judge bore that he had left the question to the jury, “under a full reservation to the defenders of all their pleas in law, and on the condition that if the Court should hold, &c. &c., and if the Court farther thought the question under the second issue turned wholly on a point of law for the Court, the Court should be entitled to

No. 8.
 Feb. 19, 1857.
 M'Ewan v.
 Campbell.

give judgment at once on such point, without the case being again sent to a jury." The verdict was in these terms:—"The jury, as directed by the Lord Justice-Clerk, find for the defenders on the first issue. On the second issue, they find for the pursuer; but with power to the Court to enter up the verdict for the defenders, and to give judgment in the cause if the Court shall be of opinion," &c. &c.—here followed several points reserved for the opinion of the Court.

The Lord Chancellor remarked,—"The jury have no business at all to say what the Court is to do. The jury have to find facts. They may find simpliciter for the pursuer, they may find for the defender, and they may find a special verdict, but having found for the pursuer or for the defender, they can give no authority to the Court to enter up a verdict in any other way. That can only be done by an arrangement between the Judge at the trial and the parties. And the difficulty here is in understanding exactly what did pass at the trial, and what was the course really taken, because unquestionably, except by the consent of the pursuer, the learned Judge had no right to do more than state the law to the jury, and to tell them, upon that state of the law—Find for the pursuer, or find for the defender. I confess that my interpretation of this would be, that this was done with the consent of the parties. But then the Lord Advocate says that that was not the fact. There one is embarrassed. But, at the same time, I must treat the Judge's notes as being notes adequately and properly representing what passed, and I think I must, therefore, in dealing with the case, assume that by consent in some way or other an arrangement, which was the most rational that could be suggested, was come to, because it really saved the expense of another trial."

THE judgment of the Court below, entering up the verdict for the defenders, and assolzieing them, was affirmed, and the appeal dismissed with costs.

No. 9. WILLIAM M'EWAN, Pursuer and Appellant.—Rolt, Q.C.—Roxburgh.
 SIR JAMES CAMPBELL Bart. AND OTHERS, Defenders and Respondents.—
At.-Gen. Sir R. Bethell—Anderson, Q.C.

Process—Summons—Revised condescendence—Agent and principal—Provisional committee.—Held, (affirming judgment of Court of Session), 1. That the relevancy of an action is to be judged of on the original, not on the revised condescendence, which cannot add to the grounds of action. 2. That individual members of a provisional committee for promoting a railway do not, as such, incur a conjunct and several liability for all the work done by a person who acted as secretary to the committee.

Feb. 19, 1857. (IN Court of Session, 6th Dec. 1853, ante, vol. xvi. p. 117.)

Lord Cran-
 worth, C.
 Ld. Wensley-
 dale.

On the allegation that the defenders inter alia constituted a provisional committee for promoting a railway; that the provisional committee, or their law agents, as authorised by them, employed the pursuer as their secretary, and that, as such, he did certain work; he raised action concluding against them as conjunctly and severally liable for all the work he did. The Court of Session, affirming an interlocutor of Lord Curriehill, dismissed the action as irrelevant. On an appeal, the Lord Chancellor remarked that, as members of the provisional committee, no such liability as was contended for attached. The case of *Bright v. Hutton*¹ had settled the law. If the pursuer had any special case against the individuals, an amendment was required. His revised condescendence had slightly amplified, but not altered, the grounds of action—indeed, this last would have been incompetent. His Lordship concurred with all the Judges in the Court below, who thought that on the construction of the Act 1849, the original condescendence so clearly stood in the place of the original ground of action in the summons, that if that original condescendence did not state a valid ground of action, it could not be eked out by a revised condescendence.

No. 9.

Feb. 23, 1857.
Philip v. Edinburgh, Perth, and Dundee Railway Co.

Lord Wensleydale remarked, that it was formerly supposed that a provisional committee constituted a partnership, in which each individual gave a mandate to the others to act in all affairs concerning that committee, and that they were liable as co-partners. The whole frame of the condescendence is to make out that the defenders were in fact, or were with their sanction, represented to be members of the provisional committee, and therefore responsible. In that point of view there was no relevant cause of action against the defenders.

APPEAL dismissed with costs.

ROBERT PHILIP, Pursuer and Respondent.—Lord Adv. Moncreiff—Rolt, Q.C.

No. 10.

EDINBURGH, PERTH, AND DUNDEE RAILWAY COMPANY, Defenders and Appellants.—Att.-Gen. Sir R. Bethell—Anderson, Q.C.

Contract—Condition—Railway company—Construction.—Purchase by a railway company of lands, part of which were required for a proposed line, which held to be conditional on the execution of the railway.

(IN the Court of Session, 14th July 1854, ante, vol. xvi, p. 1065.)

Feb. 23, 1857.

A Railway Company introduced a bill to enable them to make a branch. Pending their bill, they, in order to obtain the assent of a proprietor, did “agree to acquire the whole ground” belonging to him, through part of which it was intended that a railway should pass, and “to make payment of the” price which was fixed: A separate article in the same writing bore, the company “became bound to pay the said sum at the first term” “after the said company on obtaining their Act of Parliament shall have begun to execute any part of the said railway,” &c. The Act was obtained: it contained the usual clause, limiting the power of execution to seven years. The railway was never made. Held (differing from the Court of Session), that on the construction of the contract the purchase was not absolute, but that the execution of the railway was a condition of it, and imported more than a morata solutio of a completed sale; and therefore (as the House were of opinion, in point of fact, that the execution of the railway had never been commenced, while the power to execute

Lord Cran-
worth, C.
Ld Wensley-
dale.

¹ House of Lords Cases, vol. iii. p. 341.

No. 10. had expired), that the Railway Company could not be compelled to pay the price.
 Mar. 12, 1857.
 Baillie v.
 Cochrane.

INTERLOCUTOR reversed, and case remitted, with a declaration.

No. 11. A. D. R. C. W. BAILLIE, Pursuer and Respondent.—Att.-Gen.
Sir R. Bethell—Rolt, Q.C.
 Miss C. M. E. COCHRANE, AND OTHERS, Defenders and Appellants.—
Anderson, Q.C.—J. Boyd Kinneir.

Entail—Marriage-contract—Procuratory—Obligation—Prescription—
 11 & 12 Vict. c. 36, sect. 43.—A marriage-contract, commencing with an obligation to entail lands, contained “for that effect” a procuratory of resignation, in which the conditions were not set forth ad longum, but only by reference to another entail;—Held (aff. judgment of Court of Session), 1, that a good entail had not been executed.

2. That a charter of resignation, bearing to follow on this procuratory, but containing the conditions ad longum, not being conform to the procuratory, did not form a valid entail.

3. *That though a deed of entail might be good inter hæredes under the old law although defective, it was struck at by the 43d section of the Entail Amendment Act, if defective in any prohibition.

4. That the subsequent execution of a strict entail was ultra vires of the heir then in possession under the entail in question, as it was good inter hæredes.

5. That in the marriage-contract the procuratory was intended by the parties as implement of the obligation to entail, and therefore that no obligation to execute any other deed of entail had been constituted.

Question, Whether, if there had, in the original contract, been a good obligation to entail, it would have been cut down by the negative prescription?

Process—Entail.—Question, Whether it is necessary for an heir-substitute possessing under an imperfect entail to bring a declarator, in order that he may enjoy the estate as absolute fiar?

Mar. 12, 1857. (In the Court of Session, 9th March 1855, ante, vol. xvii. p. 659.)
 Lord Cranworth, C.
 Lord St Leonards.
 Ld. Wensleydale.
 In 1715 an heir in possession of an entailed estate bound himself, in his daughter's marriage-contract, to settle certain other lands on the heirs of the marriage under the fetters of the entail of his entailed lands; and “for that effect,” in the contract, he and his daughter granted a procuratory of resignation, referring merely to the fetters of the entailed lands. In 1772 a charter of resignation was expedite, containing ad longum the fetters referred to. Soon after, the heir then in possession (1786) executed a new entail, complete, in terms of the statute, and recorded it, but it was not feudalised. The heir now in possession made up his titles as heir of the marriage, under the contract and charter. Two cross actions were brought, one a declarator by the heir, to have it found that the entail was defective, and therefore that he was entitled, under the Entail Amendment Act, to the estate in fee simple; the other against the heir, and to have it found that even though the entail were defective, he was not entitled to take advantage of the

June 12, 1857.

* DEMPSTER v. DEMPSTER.

Lord Cranworth, C.
 Ld. Wensley-

THIS point was again decided, of this date. There was no other question involved in this case.

Act, but on the contrary, as the obligation in the marriage-contract was to execute a good entail, he, the heir of the marriage, was now bound to do so. No. 11.
Mar. 20, 1857.

In both actions the Court decided in favour of the heir. In both an appeal was taken. The decision of the case was held to turn upon the view that the deed bore to implement itself, and therefore contained no obligation that more should be done than was done by the deed, which parties had intended to contain execution of its purpose. There was thus no covenant but what had been performed; and it was observed by the Lord Chancellor, that if there had been, it could not affect heirs-substitute, on whom lay only an obligation to possess in terms of the investiture.

Their Lordships held it, therefore, unnecessary to deal with the question of prescription as affecting the obligation, had it existed; and it remained only to apply principles already settled in the law of entail to the other points in the case.

INTERLOCUTORS affirmed.

W. KELSO MARTIN AND OTHERS, Appellants.—Lord Adv. Moncreiff— No. 12.
Rolt, Q. C.

ELEONORA KELSO AND OTHERS, Respondents.—Att.-Gen. Sir R. Bethell—
Anderson, Q. C.

Entail—Constitution—Fetters—Altering succession—Construction.—An entail gave powers to heirs in possession, “so often as their presumptive heirs were females,” so to alter the succession as “to settle the estate upon a younger daughter in preference to an elder daughter;”—Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Session), that an heir in possession was entitled to exercise this power by calling to the succession a younger in preference to an elder sister, though not his daughter, and that a deed of alteration was effectual in favour of the lady preferred and her heirs, though she only should survive the granter, and at the date of his death the next heir under the entail, but for the deed of alteration, would have been the son of the elder sister who had predeceased.

(In the Court of Session, 19th July 1853. See ante, vol. xv. p. 950.) Mar. 20, 1857.

The entail of the estate of Dankeith contained a clause empowering the institute and the other heirs of entail, “so often as their apparent or presumptive heirs are females, so far to alter the destination of succession” specified in the deed, “as to settle the estate upon a younger daughter in preference to an elder daughter, or to pass by such daughters altogether, and settle the estate upon the presumptive heir-male;” and, “for these ends, to grant such deed or deeds as shall be competent of the law,” &c. The late Colonel Kelso being heir in possession, whose heirs presumptive were his four sisters, executed a deed calling the youngest, Miss Eleonora Kelso, to the succession. While in possession under this deed she executed another, calling to the succession after her Mrs Utterson, the youngest of her two then surviving sisters. She thereafter presented a petition for authority to disentail under the Entail Amendment Act, which was served upon Mrs Utterson and her two sons as the next heirs of entail, and the disentail was carried through. A reduction was brought at the instance of Mr Martin, the son of her eldest sister, who had died before

Lord Cranworth, C.
Lord Wensleydale.

No. 12. the disentail was completed. It was held in the Court of Session, that the deed of alteration executed by Colonel Kelso was good, though the heirs-female were not his daughters. That the deed of alteration executed was effectual, in favour not only of the heir-female preferred, Miss Eleonora Kelso, but also of her heirs; and that a similar deed executed by Miss Kelso, as at the time of its execution there were two or more heirs-female in life, was effectual in favour of the party preferred, though she alone should survive the granter, and an older heir-female who was excluded was survived by a son, who at Miss Kelso's death was, but for the deed of alteration, the heir under the entail.

Mar. 20, 1857.
Martin v.
Kelso.

The pursuer appealed.

The Lord Chancellor moved that the judgment of the Court of Session should be affirmed. Lord Wensleydale concurred. In delivering his opinion, he remarked on the only part on which their Lordships felt any difficulty;—when a deed of alteration was executed, it was necessary that there should be two or more presumptive heirs-female, in order to the due execution of the power; and it was contended that there ought equally to be two or more when the succession opened, in order to give it effect. Only one of the sisters of Miss Eleonora Kelso survived her. Her eldest sister was dead, leaving a son, and he was heir of entail, and would have been entitled to succeed at that time as an heir-male. After his mother's death, the power to alter could not have been exercised by Miss Kelso. But he held that a condition which is not clearly expressed ought not to be implied—viz. the condition that more than one heir-female should exist not only at the time of the execution of the deed of alteration, but also at the time of the death of the person executing that deed. The clause in the original deed of entail was perfectly reasonable without such a condition. It gives a present right to make a change which shall regulate future succession; and in the language of the Lord Justice-Clerk, was in itself a present act final, and not dependant on the state of things at the time of the death of the grantee.

INDEX OF MATTERS

IN VOLUME XIX.

[For facility of reference, points decided in the House of Lords are printed in Italics.]

ACTS OF SEDERUNT.

14th December 1756. See Lease, 12.—11th July 1828. See Process, 17.—24th December 1838. See Cassio, 2, 4—Process, 76.—9th July 1839. See Cassio, 3.—Dec. 21, 1842. See Poor's Roll, 1.

ACQUIESCENCE.

Circumstances which held not to import acquiescence by one of two joint tenants, under a lease to them and the survivor and his heirs, in an assignation by the other to his nephew of one-half the lease. Robertson, March 10, 1857, p. 667.

See Bankruptcy, 3—Process, 35, 40.

AGENT AND CLIENT.

1. Where a cause was set down for trial by jury, and the pursuer's agent ceased to act for him, the Court refused to make any intimation to the party. Scott, Dec. 16, 1856, p. 178.

2. It is the duty generally of an agent to intimate to his client an interlocutor in a litigation allowing a proof. Ross, June 12, 1857, p. 853.

See Process, 32—Proof, 3—Reparation, 5, 6—Repetition, 1—Trust, 2.

AGENT AND PRINCIPAL.—Constitution of relation.

1. Averments which held not to amount to a relevant allegation of agency. Steuart, July 17, 1857, p. 1071.

Mutual Rights.

2. Delay in advising shipment of goods which held not to impose on commission agents liability to their constituents for loss of the goods. Hastie, Feb. 26, 1857, p. 557.

3. There is no rule requiring shipping agents to give notice of goods having come to hand or of intention to ship, but it is their duty to lose no time in giving notice of shipment having taken place, and in considering whether notice has in any circumstances been timeous or not, the existence of a telegraph is matter for consideration. Hastie, Feb. 26, 1857, p. 557.

4. An agent who, being employed to sell shares, purchases for himself without communicating with his principal, does so in violation of his duty. Gourlay's Trustees, June 6, 1857, p. 789.

5. An action by the seller of shares, sold through a broker, against the purchaser, to compel him to take up the shares, was dismissed without expenses. Held that the purchaser was not entitled to recover from the broker the costs of the litigation. Cullen, July 10, 1857, p. 969.

AGENT AND PRINCIPAL—Continued.

6. Question whether a broker employed to carry on gaming transactions is entitled to recover payment of his account. Foulds, June 10, 1857, p. 803.
See Partnership, 1, 2—Proof, 12—Repetition, 3—Trust, 6.

ALIEN.

The son and grandson of a person who had emigrated to America held entitled, although born and resident there, to the privileges of British subjects, so far, at least, as to give valid consents to a disentail. Stewart, Feb. 13, 1857, p. 430.

APPEAL.—Competency.

1. Where the presiding Judge at a jury trial "of consent discharged the jury without a verdict, and in order that the case might be decided by the Court upon the notes," appeal against the judgment of the Court dismissed as incompetent, on the ground that it must be looked upon as a verdict by the jury. Magistrates of Renfrew, June 12, 1856, H. L. p. 2.
2. At a jury trial, in respect parties held "there is no question of fact on which the opinion of the jury could be taken, and that the case on the facts, as now proved, turns wholly on questions of law for the Court, the Lord Justice-Clerk discharged the jury in order that parties may bring the whole case before the Court for judgment, each party being entitled to state any questions of law which the facts raise;"—Held, that the judgment pronounced by the Court of Session was subject to appeal. Dixon, July 29, 1856, H. L. p. 9.

Leave to appeal.

3. Circumstances in which leave to appeal one branch of a case was granted, on the understanding that the evidence should be proceeded with in the rest of the cause. Losh, Jan. 14, 1857, p. 267.
4. In an action for defamation, no issue in justification having been taken, a diligence to enable the defender to prove facts in mitigation of damages was refused. Petition for leave to appeal against that judgment refused. Blaikie, July 18, 1857, p. 1095.

Execution pending Appeal.

5. It is incompetent to give the Lord Ordinary on the bills power to grant execution pending appeal during vacation. Granger, July 16, 1857, p. 1010.

Expenses.

6. The House of Lords remitted to the appeal committee to decide who should bear the cost of discussing a question as to the competency of an appeal. Magistrates of Renfrew, June 12, 1856, H. L. p. 2.

ARBITRATION.

Terms of a submission entered into which held to be partly statutory and partly at common law, and therefore not to fall either by the lapse of three months without a final decree, or by the death of one of the parties. Caledonian Railway Company, Feb. 23, 1857, p. 527.

See Interdict, 4.

ARRESTMENT. See Bankruptcy, 14—Ship, 1.

ASSIGNATION. See Bankruptcy, 10, 12, 15.

BANK.

An entry in a pass-book to the credit of a depositor, duly initialed by the officers of the bank, being in re mercatoria, is a probative writ as against the bank. Rhind, Feb. 24, 1857, p. 519.

See Succession, 4—Title to sue, 2.

BANKRUPTCY. Sequestration—Awarding and recall.

1. Sequestrations awarded before 1st November 1856 may be conducted under the old Bankrupt Act; but where, though proceedings have commenced, sequestration has not been awarded before 1st November 1856, sequestration may be awarded under the new Act without a special interlocutor to that effect. Drummond, Nov. 14 1856, p. 42.
2. An official manager was, under the winding-up Acts, appointed on a joint-stock company. He made a call upon the executorial estate of a deceased partner, which call was not paid;—Held, that the claim was not a debt due by the deceased partner in the sense of the statute 2 & 3 Vict. cap. 41, and, therefore, that sequestration at the instance of the official manager was incompetent. Wryghte, Nov. 20, 1856, p. 55.

BANKRUPTCY—Continued.

3. A creditor who became a candidate for the office of trustee in a sequestration, and otherwise took part in the proceedings;—Held barred from applying for recall of sequestration on grounds inferring no radical defect in it, nor injury to the general body of creditors. Ure, 28th May 1857, p. 758.

Estate attachable.

4. A pension payable to a deceased Judge's clerk held not to fall under the provisions of the Act 19 & 20 Vict. c. 79, sec. 149, for ordering payment to creditors of portions of certain salaries and pensions paid by Government. Latta, 18th July 1857, p. 1107.

Person of Bankrupt.

5. A bankrupt has a title, without concurrence of his trustee, to reclaim against an interlocutor by a Lord Ordinary in a question of personal protection. Murray, Nov. 15, 1856, p. 44.
6. Question. whether the Court of Session has power under the Bankruptcy Act, 19 & 20 Vict., c. 79, to grant liberation from an English prison. Circumstances which in any view held not to amount to a case for liberation. Robertson, July 14, 1857, p. 996.

Trustee.

7. The trustee in a sequestration is entitled to insist in an action for solatium for injury to character by Acts prior to the sequestration, brought by a bankrupt discharged on payment of a dividend. Thom, Mar. 11, 1857, p. 721.
8. A trustee who had procured the vote and influence of a creditor by a promise to give him remunerative employment in the sequestration;—Held guilty of corruption, removed, and disqualified from again becoming a candidate. Mann, July 1, 1857, p. 942.
9. Procedure where the election of a trustee was set aside as illegal. Mann, July 1, 1857, p. 942.

Recovery and sale of estate.

10. The trustee on a bankrupt estate sold furniture, and duly executed an assignation. The purchaser paid part of the price. The trustee was removed before he got the balance, and delivered the assignation. The purchaser allowed the bankrupt to remain in possession of the furniture;—Held that the purchaser having paid in bona fide, the assignation was good evidence of the contract of sale, and by its delivery the sale was completed, and the new trustee could not repudiate it. Mitchell, Nov. 12, 1856, p. 30.
11. That a purchase by private sale, from the trustee and commissioners, of a debt forming part of a sequestrated estate, does not give a good title to sue the debtor. Robertson, Feb. 20, 1857, p. 502.

Ranking.

12. Brokers, holding no assignation from the underwriters, and not producing the policies of insurance, are not entitled to rank upon the bankrupt estate of the insured on an account for premiums, nor can they vote in a question of granting personal protection. Murray, Nov. 15, 1856, p. 44.
13. The change of i into y, in the subscription of an affidavit and claim, where neither the altered spelling nor the handwriting corresponded with those of a bill on which the claim was founded, is a vitiation in essentialibus, and cuts down the vote of the claimant. Murray, Nov. 15, 1856, p. 44.
14. The first deliverance on an application for sequestration of the estate of a deceased debtor was not made till after the lapse of more than seven months from the date of his death. Arrestments were used within sixty days of the sequestration;—Held that the arrestment was struck at by 2 & 3 Vict. c. 41, sect. 83. Rough's Trustees, Jan. 23, 1857, p. 305.
15. By assignation ex facie absolute, a wife, with consent of her husband, conveyed (in security) to a bank an heritable bond to which she had right in her own person, but from which the jus mariti was not excluded. Some time thereafter the husband was sequestrated;—Held (1.) Sequestration of the husband operated an adjudication of his jus mariti. (2.) That the interest on the bond accrued to the bank as the holders of the assignation, and not to their cedent;

BANKRUPTCY—Continued.

- the wife of the bankrupt, therefore, did not fall under the jus mariti of her husband. Smith, Feb. 7, 1857, p. 385.
16. A copartnership granted to a bank a cash-credit bond. In security, two of the partners conveyed their separate estates to the bank by dispositions ex facie absolute. These two partners having died, their representatives sold their estates to the remaining partners, who, after paying one instalment of the price, became bankrupt;—Held that the estates, as conveyed to the bank, formed a collateral security separate from the company estates, and the bank not having been parties to the sale, were not bound to value the security as one over the estate of the bankrupt. M'Clelland, Feb. 27, 1857, p. 574.
17. A claim was rejected by a trustee, although the debt was entered in the bankrupts' states and corroborated by their books;—Held that the trustee should have called for farther evidence, which was allowed to be produced on appeal within two months of the first dividend. Pilling, June 30, 1857, p. 938.
18. In litigations between partners of a mercantile firm, in neither of which the company appeared, remits were made to an accountant. The firm having been sequestrated,—Held that the accountant was not entitled to rank on the company estate. Barstow, July 15, 1857, p. 1002.

See Fee and Liferent.

Discharge.

19. Under 2 & 3 Vict. c. 41, a creditor is entitled to oppose a bankrupt's discharge before the Lord Ordinary has confirmed the Sheriff's deliverance, where no objection was stated before the Sheriff and no appeal was taken. Question, Whether a creditor could appear without a regular appeal, if the Sheriff had given judgment after hearing objections? Taylor, Dec. 12, 1856, p. 145.

Appeal.

20. The Sheriff, by the last of several interlocutors, sustained a claim which the trustee had rejected;—Held that under an appeal against this last interlocutor it was competent to review the previous ones. Pilling, June 30, 1857, p. 938.

Intestate estate.

21. Appointment of a judicial factor "to distribute" an intestate estate partly heritable and partly moveable, on the application of the parties interested in it who were creditors under a marriage-contract, and the executors of the widow, creditors for advances by her. No title had been made up, parties entered into an agreement as to their interests. To meet the claims a sale was essential, but the heirs-at-law were pupils. Question, Whether the statute applies to all intestate estates, even if the heir-at-law or executor were willing to make up titles? Macfarlane, March 6, 1857, p. 656.

BILL OF EXCHANGE. See Proof, 11.

BURGH. Elections.

1. At the annual meeting for the election of office-bearers of a royal burgh, a motion was made for the adjournment of the election till a specified day. An amendment to proceed at once and elect certain gentlemen was adopted by a minority. Interdict at the instance of the minority to prevent the majority proceeding with an election refused, on the ground that from the questions whether election should be proceeded with, and who should be elected, not having been put separately, all the councillors present had not an opportunity of voting in regard to this election;—Observed, that it was not incompetent to adjourn a meeting for the election of magistrates. Gibson, Dec. 20, 1856, p. 261.
2. "The common good and property, heritable and moveable, and means and revenues, and income of every description," of "the barony of Gorbals," was transferred to and vested in the Magistrates and Town-Council of Glasgow;—Held, in an action raised by the minister of the parish of Gorbals, that property belonging to the feuars and villagers of Gorbals, who were liable for the stipend of the minister of the parish of Gorbals, did not fall under this clause. Houston, March 11, 1857, p. 734.

CAUTIONER.

The provision of the Statute 19 & 20 Vict. c. 60, sect. 9, that the discharge of one of several cautioners shall operate as a discharge to all, applies only to cases where the bond of caution has been executed subsequent to the passing of the Act. Church of England Assurance Company, July 17, 1857, p. 1079.

See Process, 58—Writ, 1.

CESSIO.

1. A party whose principal debt was past aliment for a bastard, held entitled to cessio, on finding caution for future aliment. Chisholm, Dec. 2, 1856, p. 116.

Protection.

2. Where the inducias of a summons of cessio expired during vacation, personal protection granted on caution till the ensuing Session. Marnoch, March 4, 1857, p. 598.

Review.

3. It is incompetent to reclaim against an interlocutor of the Sheriff in a cessio, unless it dispose of the question, whether there shall be cessio or not. Galbraith, Dec. 6, 1856, p. 136.
4. Reclaiming note against the judgment of a Sheriff refusing cessio held incompetent, because delivery of a copy to the respondent was not attested in terms of Act of Sederunt 24th December 1838. Holt, May 29, 1857, p. 785.

CHURCH. See Burgh, 2—Interdict, 1.

CLAUSE. See Burgh, 2—Railway, 4.

DEATHBED.

1. In a reduction ex capite lecti of a holograph writing of which the date was not authenticated, allegation of facts and circumstances leading to the presumption that it was executed of the date it bore, though not exclusive of the possibility of execution on deathbed, held relevant to go to proof, and decree of reduction de plano refused. Fairholme, Dec. 16, 1856, p. 178.
2. Question, whether, in a reduction of a deed ex facie gratuitous, on the ground of deathbed, it is competent to have effect given to claims of the disponee against the granter of the deed. Jack, May 20, 1857, p. 747.

See Process, 24.

DELEGATION see Discharge.

DILIGENCE.

A warrant of sale of poinded effects suspended on the ground that the warrant of sale did not specify the place where the goods were to be sold. M'Vicar, July 2, 1857, p. 948.

See Process, 43—Reparation 1, 5.

DISCHARGE.

Circumstances in which held that a party, who tendered delivery of goods as on the order of a copartnery, had agreed to make the furnishings as to a new firm that succeeded the other, and discharged their claim for the price against the original copartnery. Question, whether the circumstances here amounted to delegation? Pearston, Dec. 18, 1856, p. 197.

DOMICILE.

Circumstances in which held that a Scotchman possessed of land in Scotland had died domiciled in Trinidad, which was therefore his domicile as regarded all questions of legacy duty. Lamont, May 29, 1857, p. 779.

ENTAIL—Constitution and Fetters.

1. A marriage-contract, commencing with an obligation to entail lands, contained "for that effect" a procuratory of resignation, in which the conditions were not set forth ad longum, but only by reference to another entail;—Held (aff. judgment of Court of Session), 1, that a good entail had not been executed. 2, That a charter of resignation, bearing to follow on this procuratory, but containing the conditions ad longum, not being conform to the procuratory did not form a valid entail. 3, That the subsequent execution of a strict entail was ultra vires of the heir then in possession under the entail in question, as it was good inter hæredes.

ENTAIL—Continued.

4. That in the marriage-contract the procuratory was intended by the parties as implement of the obligation to entail, and therefore that no obligation to execute a good entail had been constituted. Baillie, March 12, 1857, H. L. p. 14.
2. Power to alter the succession "so often as their presumptive heirs were females" may be exercised by a deed inter vivos where the heirs-presumptive are sisters of the heir in possession, and the deed of alteration will be effectual though at the death of the heir altering only one of the sisters be alive, and but for the alteration, the estate would have gone under the original destination, to the son of the other. Martin, March 20, 1857, H. L. p. 15.
3. Terms of irritant clause which held not to fence sufficiently a prohibition against disposing. Fairlie, March 3, 1857, p. 596.
4. A petition for authority to record a deed of entail, presented by trustees under a settlement, was opposed by the heir, called as institute, who declined to take under the deed;—Held, that as he did not aver that positive injury would result from recording the deed, the Court could not withhold their authority. Gilmour, Dec. 6, 1856, p. 134.
- Heir in possession—Faculty and powers.*
5. What are improvements in the sense of the Montgomery Act? Marquis of Huntly, June 12, 1857, p. 818.
6. What are improvements in the sense of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 36. Johnston, Nov. 21, 1856, p. 68; Hamilton, March 11, 1857, p. 723; Marquis of Huntly, June 12, 1857, p. 818; Skene, July 10, 1857, p. 964.
7. What evidence that improvements have been executed will be admitted where no vouchers have been preserved. Stirling, May 29, 1857, p. 767; Marquis of Huntly, June 12, 1857, p. 818.
8. Part of the price of lands sold under 11 & 12 Vict. c. 36, sect. 25, for payment of debt, applied in payment of arrears of interest arising subsequently to the interlocutor finding the estate validly charged with debt. Riddell, Jan. 17, 1857, p. 282.
9. An entail proprietor who had craved, and obtained and exercised, authority under the Entail Amendment Act to execute bonds and dispositions for two-thirds of three-fourths of sums so expended by him on improvements of the nature contemplated by the Montgomery Act;—Held not barred from applying for authority to grant bonds for the full amount of two-thirds of his expenditure subsequent to 14th August 1848. Earl of Kintore, Jan. 31, 1857, p. 343.
10. An heir of entail in possession having obtained decree under the Montgomery Act for three-fourths of his expenditure on improvements subsequent to the passing of the Entail Amendment Act of 1848, obtained authority to apply trust-funds to payment of three-fourths of his expenditure, and exhausted that power, he was afterwards held entitled, under sect. 14 of the 11 & 12 Vict. cap. 36, to grant bonds of annualrent for the remaining one-fourth of his expenditure. Earl of Eglinton. Jan. 31, 1857, p. 346.
- Disentailing—Entailed fund.*
11. That though a deed of entail might be good inter hæredes under the old law although defective, it was struck at by the 43d section of the Entail Amendment Act, if defective in any prohibition. Baillie, March 12, 1857, H. L. p. 14; Dempster, June 12, 1857, H. L. p. 14.
12. Question, Whether it is necessary for an heir-substitute possessing under an imperfect entail to bring a declarator, in order that he may enjoy the estate as absolute fiar? Baillie, March 12, 1857, H. L. p. 14.
13. A trust for executing entails having been constituted by marriage-contract and relative trust-deed in 1811 and 1812, and a judicial factor on the trust being in 1856 in a position to execute the entail;—Held that the heir of entail must be held to have been in possession since 1812, and funds uninvested could be dealt with under sects. 4 & 43 of the Entail Amendment Act, 11 & 12 Vict. c. 36. M'Donald, Feb. 21, 1857, p. 506.
14. Consents to a disentail defeating provisions in a marriage-contract to a wife and younger children, sustained, although the heir disentailing, and his eldest son, heir-apparent, were both parties to the marriage-contract. Maxwell, Feb. 27, 1857, p. 571.

ENTAIL—Continued.

15. In an application for disentail, intimation ordered to be made to daughters, to whom the estate would go, as heirs-portioners, under the title of "heirs whomsoever," on failure of two heirs of entail under the destination, although such heirs-portioners were not heirs of entail. Gibb, May 29, 1857, p. 768.
16. Where proceedings under the Entail Amendment Act were ordered to be intimated to minor heirs-portioners who might possibly succeed to the estate, a curator ad litem was appointed to each. Gibb, May 29, 1857, p. 768.
17. A deed of consent to a disentail signed by the petitioner's brother for himself, and as administrator-in-law and legal guardian for his pupil sons;—Held insufficient, and a tutor ad litem to the pupils appointed. Dalrymple, July 10, 1857, p. 964.

See Alien.

18. An heir of entail obtained decree for three-fourths of improvement expenditure, but died without charging the estate. Authority granted to the succeeding heir to execute a bond for two-thirds thereof in favour of a party who advanced that amount. Sinclair, March 6, 1857, p. 660.
19. Under 11 & 12 Vict. cap. 36, what is free rental, in fixing the amount of improvement debts which can be constituted against an estate? Hamilton, March 11, 1857, p. 723.

Provisions to widow and children.

20. An institute heir of entail is entitled to exercise the powers conferred by the Aberdeen Act of granting provisions to younger children. Hamilton, March 11, 1857, p. 723.
- See Process, 84, 85, 86.

EXCLUSIVE PRIVILEGE.—Patents.

1. In a question of damages for infringement of patent,—Held (1), that the date of the patent is that of filing the provisional specification; (2), that a patentee is entitled to put down the use of a contemporaneous invention; (3), that priority of invention by another party, unaccompanied by use in trade, does not invalidate a patentee's right. Opinion, that use by a party of his own invention during the period between the filing of a specification by another and granting a patent in his favour, does not subject as an infringer. Smith, March 11, 1857, p. 691.
2. The patentee of an invention for the improvement of fire grates claimed the application and use of a kind of detent link or holder, which was proved to have been previously in use and applied to grates,—Held that its use was not an infringement of the patent. Finlay, July 17, 1857, p. 1087.

See Process, 33, 34.

EXECUTOR.—Confirmation.

A daughter, confirmed executor to her father, who on the predecease of his wife had retained the goods in communion, which got mixed up in his executry, and were given up in the inventory, is not entitled, before paying to her sister her proportion of her mother's succession, to demand that a separate title be made up to the mother's share. Smith, Jan. 15, 1857, p. 267.

EXPENSES.—Awarding.

1. An arbiter ordained a railway company to deposit the sum he found due for lands acquired by them, and the proprietor to grant a disposition, which he failed to do. The company, having consigned the money, completed their title under section 76 of the Lands Clauses Act. Held, that the expense of an application for warrant to uplift the consigned money formed a valid charge against the company. Moncrieff, Jan. 17, 1857, p. 283.
2. Expense of a petition to apply a judgment of the House of Lords allowed where the interlocutor appealed and affirmed was not one that exhausted the case, which had to be farther proceeded in. Bovill, Jan. 31, 1857, p. 356.
3. Expense of an unsuccessful application for special powers sustained against the estate of a lunatic. Maconochie, Feb. 4, 1857, p. 366.
4. An interlocutor in an advocacy of one branch of a case finding "the advocator liable in expenses," held to carry the expenses both in the Court of EXPENSES—Continued.

Session and in the Inferior Court on that branch of the litigation. Halbert, May 28, 1857, p. 762.

5. There is no absolute rule that a new trial is only granted on the condition of payment of the expenses of the first trial. Dargie, June 23, 1857, p. 878.
See Agent and Principal, 5—Appeal, 6—Judicial Factor, 21, 22—Partnership, 2—Process, 3—Trust, 6.

FACILITY.

1. In a question as to whether an investment was heritable or moveable, held incompetent to put in issue, whether the investment was not the act of the deceased? Johnston, March 11, 1857, p. 706.
2. In a reduction of a disposition, averments which held sufficient to entitle the pursuer to an issue, on the ground of mental incapacity, but not of fraud and circumvention. Halliday, June 27, 1857, p. 929.

FACULTY. See Testament, 4.

FEE AND LIFERENT.

The destination in a conveyance by a wife was “to and in favour of her and her husband, and longest liver of them two, in conjunct fee and liferent, and to their children, which failing, to the said longest liver of them two, and the said longest liver her or his heirs and assignees.” There were children of the marriage. The husband survived the wife, and was sequestrated. After his death,—Held, that the fee of the estate had not vested. Myles, Feb. 12, 1857, p. 408.

FOREIGN. See Domicile—Husband and Wife, 3—Judicial Factor, 3, 4, 12, 19—Jurisdiction, 2—Process, 72, 73.

FRAUD.

1. Issue in a reduction on the ground of fraud, under which held that the jury could not find for the pursuer unless fraud, the act of some party named in the issue, were proved. Purdon, Dec. 19, 1856, p. 206.
2. Averments of fraud which held not relevant to support a reduction by a wife of a deed executed for her husband's benefit. Priestnell, Feb. 20, 1857, p. 495.
See Facility, 2.

GAMING.

Where a party employs a broker to buy and sell stocks which he neither possesses nor intends to take up, such is not gaming in the sense of 8 & 9 Vict. cap. 109, and the broker is entitled to ordinary business charges. Foulds, June 10, 1857, p. 803.

See Agent and Principal, 6.

HOMOLOGATION.

Dealings with trustees acting under a universal settlement, which held not to bar the parties from insisting after many years on their legal claims. Keith's Trustees, July 17, 1857, p. 1040.

HUSBAND AND WIFE.

1. In a petition by a married woman for a judicial factor to protect her rights under her marriage contract, the Court appointed a curator ad litem before pronouncing the usual order for intimation and service. Davidson, June 18, 1857, p. 862.
2. A party, by antenuptial marriage contract, destined lands to his heirs-male, whom failing, to his heirs-female, &c., “the eldest heir-female always succeeding without division;” declaring that it should not be lawful for the heirs to alter the order of succession: He afterwards gratuitously disposed in favour of his son, and the heirs, &c., qualified with an obligation on his son, “to redispone to and in favour of me,” &c., omitting in this destination the provision in favour of the eldest heir-female;—Held, that the altered destination being gratuitous, was ultra vires both of the granter and the heir. Haig, Feb. 14, 1857, p. 449.
3. An English contract of marriage providing an annuity to the wife, which she accepted “in lieu and full bar and satisfaction of the dower or thirds;” and also “in full bar and satisfaction of the terce,” to which she is or otherwise might be entitled by the law of Scotland;—Held not to bar the widow’s claim of jus relictæ, and she was entitled to elect between it and provisions made by her husband’s settlement—the jus relictæ not to be reduced in amount by imputing thereto any sums provided in the contract of marriage. Keith’s Trustees, July 17, 1857, p. 1040.

HUSBAND AND WIFE—Continued.

See Bankruptcy, 15—Entail, 1—Fraud, 2—Process, 71.

INHIBITION.

1. Letters of inhibition proceeded on a bill commencing,—“My Lords, &c., Shews,” and ended, “Herefore, letters of inhibition.” Objection, that the address and prayer were not intelligible, repelled. Davidson, Dec. 20, 1856, p. 226.
2. An inhibition was executed edictally. In the bill the debtor was not designed as furth of the kingdom, and the prayer contained no application for authority to cite him as furth of the kingdom. Objection, that a warrant to cite edictally, introduced into the letters, was without authority, repelled. Davidson, Dec. 20, 1856, p. 226.
3. The execution of the messenger bore that he lawfully inhibited the debtor, and that he left a full double, to the will, of the letters of inhibition, with a just copy, &c., at the record office, &c., in terms of the statute. Objection, that it did not set forth that the debtor was abroad, or shew why the messenger adopted the mode of edictal execution, repelled. Davidson, Dec. 20, 1856, p. 226.
4. The execution of an inhibition bore that the messenger inhibited the lieges only at the market-cross of Edinburgh, pier and shore of Leith. Objection, that that mode of publication had been abolished, so that there had been truly ex facie of the execution no available publication to, or inhibition of the lieges, repelled. Davidson, Dec. 20, 1856, p. 226.
5. Circumstances in which inhibition and arrestment recalled as ruinous and oppressive. Hamilton, May 20, 1857, p. 745.

INSANE. See Expenses, 3—Judicial Factor, 6, 11, 12, 16, 18, 19, 20.

INSURANCE.

Correspondence between brokers with a view to adjustment of loss which held not to have resulted in a completed transaction so as to bar the underwriters from maintaining a policy of insurance to have been void ab initio. Losh, Nov. 28, 1856, p. 101.

INTERDICT.

1. A church belonging to an hospital was sold, after having for many years been used as a parish church;—Interdict, pending a declarator, against building a new parish church with the price, refused. Hume, Nov. 18, 1856, p. 50.
2. The stock of a tenant in arrear was sold, and he executed a renunciation of his lease. Being charged to remove, a suspension on the ground that he did not understand English, and had signed the renunciation under essential error as to its import, refused. Munro, Dec. 4, 1856, p. 127.
3. Interdict by a proprietor, to whose estate was attached an undefined servitude of pasturage over a moor, against tenants of one of the pro indiviso proprietors of the moor grazing cattle on it, their doing which was contrary to their leases, but consented to by their landlord, refused. Scott, May 29, 1857, p. 769.
4. It is not a ground for interdicting an arbiter from proceeding with a submission, that he was about to dispose of a claim alleged to be illegal, as founded on a pactum de quota litis. Farrell, July 14, 1857, p. 1000.

See Burgh, 1—Lease, 1, 3—Property—Road, 1.

INTEREST.

1. A child’s portion of a mother’s share of the goods in communion, which the father had retained in his own hands, though not claimed till twenty years after her death, bears legal interest. The term “legal interest,” where the contrary is not specified, still means five per cent. Smith, Jan. 15, 1855, p. 267.
2. Terms of summons under which a claim for interest on sums concluded for from the dates when they fell due, held competent. Stirling and Dunfermline Railway Company, March 4, 1857, p. 598.

INTEREST—Continued.

3. One railway company was in 1856 found to have been due rent to another for a lease from 1852, but the amount of the rent was not ascertained till 1856; Held, that interest was not due on each term's rent from the term when it fell due. Stirling and Dunfermline Railway Company, March 4, 1857, p. 598.
See Bankruptcy, 15—Succession, 4, 7.

JUDICIAL FACTOR.—Appointment.

1. When the appointment of a judicial factor on the estates of minors or pupils is craved, the Court appoint a curator ad litem to report as to the facts stated, and specially as to the amount of the estate, and fitness of the proposed curator or factor. Carter, Jan. 21, 1857, p. 286. Wilson, Jan. 21, 1857, p. 286.
2. A curator bonis appointed to minors puberes, and a factor loco tutoris to pupils. Carter, Jan. 21, 1857, p. 286.
3. Appointment of factor loco tutoris to a pupil resident in England, for the management of heritage in Scotland. Ross, Mar 11, 1857, p. 699.
4. A judicial factor appointed for the management of heritage in Scotland, belonging to a pupil resident in England, and to whom guardians were appointed under a will executed in the English form, and factor loco tutoris refused. Lamb, Mar. 11, 1857, p. 699.
5. Remit to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills to make an interim appointment during vacation. Taylors, 18th July 1857, p. 1097.
6. An application for appointment of a curator bonis was concurred in by the nearest male agnate of a party alleged to be insane. Answers were given in for him, accompanied by medical certificates, alleging that he was sane. Application refused. Lockhart and Others, July 17, 1857, p. 1075.

Trust-estates.

7. The Court, on the petition of beneficiaries, appointed a judicial factor to a lapsed trust, but refused to grant special powers along with the appointment. Thomson, July 10, 1857, p. 964.

See Bankruptcy, 21—Husband and Wife, 1—Partnership, 4—Process, 87.

Powers.

8. Authority refused to sell, though the beneficiaries concurred, no necessity or difficulty of administration being alleged. Watson, Nov. 28, 1856, p. 98.
9. In a judicial factor's accounts, credit allowed for repairs on a ship, nearly the only property of his ward; but opinion, that he should have applied for special powers. Macleod, Dec. 5, 1856, p. 133.
10. Special powers granted to a judicial factor on a mortification to compromise an action against ex officio trustees, as liable for gross negligence in allowing funds to be invested in the name of the treasurer, whereby they were lost. Anderson, Jan. 29, 1857, p. 329.
11. The Court has power to authorise a curator bonis of a lunatic to sell or burden the lunatic's heritable estate in a case of necessity. Circumstances in which such power was refused. Maconochie, Feb. 3, 1857, p. 366.
12. Authority granted to sink the capital of a lunatic's estate in the purchase of an annuity, with the proviso that it must be in Scotland. Paisley, March 5, 1857, p. 653.
13. Special powers refused to a factor to carry out an agreement by the beneficiaries under a trust-deed, the terms of the agreement not being strictly in accordance with the directions in the trust-deed. Keegan, Feb. 6, 1857, p. 382.
14. A factor loco tutoris obtained special powers to sell heritage affected by debts. He could not affect a sale at the upset price, and a creditor being about to adjudge, power granted to borrow a sum sufficient to pay off the debts. Wood, Feb. 13, 1857, p. 428.
15. Authority granted to a factor loco tutoris to make up titles in the person of a pupil with the view of carrying through a sale of heritage, the negotiations for which had been begun and all but completed during the lifetime of the pupil's father. Crichton, Feb. 13, 1857, p. 429.
16. Circumstances in which special powers granted to the curator bonis of a lunatic to sell heritage. Lindsay, Feb. 17, 1857, p. 455.
17. Powers granted to tutors-nominate of a child three years old to grant a lease of a farm for nineteen years. Morison, Feb. 20, 1857, p. 493.

JUDICIAL FACTOR—Continued.

18. Circumstances in which authority granted to a curator bonis of a lunatic to complete feuing transactions, and also to grant new feus. Alexander, June 26, 1857, p. 888.

19. Procedure where necessary to realise moveable estate of a lunatic in England, and invest the proceeds on heritable security in Scotland. Mathieson, June 26, 1857, p. 917.

See Nos. 27, 28, 29, 30—Partnership, 4—Property, 1.

Remuneration and charge.

20. A factor loco tutoris, partner of a law firm, employed his firm to conduct business, which they did at less expense than a separate agent would have transacted it;—Held that he was not entitled to credit for their business charges, except to the extent of the costs out of pocket. Douglas, Nov. 12, 1856, p. 1.

Opinions to the same effect in regard to a curator bonis. Mackenzie, Nov. 12, 1856, p. 1.

21. Credit allowed for the expense of amending an application for special powers. Watson, Nov. 21, 1856, p. 70.

22. A judicial factor on a trust, likely to endure for some time, applied for interim audit and approval of his accounts, but was refused, on the ground that he had invested part of the funds in railway securities. Having uplifted these and invested them on heritable security, he again applied for, and got interim approval of his accounts;—the business charges relating to the first application held a good charge against the income of the estate, the liferenters having concurred in the investments. The Accountant's fee under the first petition allowed. Morison, Dec. 5, 1856, p. 132.

Exoneration and recall.

23. A judicial factor was appointed on the estate of an intestate whose representatives were unknown, the Court declined, on the application of parties who afterwards administered, to grant warrant to transfer the estate to them, to recall the factory, and discharge the cautioner. Judgment delayed till the factor should apply for discharge. Williamson, Nov. 28, 1856, p. 99.

24. There is no absolute rule that a petition for recall of a factory must be in name of the factor himself. Livingstone, Jan. 16, 1857, p. 280.

25. The Court will not, as a matter of course, grant exoneration to a curator,—the ward concurring,—but will grant warrant for delivery of the bond of caution. Mackay, Feb. 21, 1857, p. 503.

26. The Court, on the representation that a trust-settlement had been destroyed, appointed a factor ad interim to manage the estate. After a proving of the tenor of the deed, and trustees named had accepted, the appointment of factor was, on their application, recalled. Drummond, June 13, 1857, p. 859.

Pupils Protection Act.

27. The provisions of the Pupils Protection Act only apply to factors loco tutoris, factors loco absentis, and curators bonis. Morrison, Feb. 21, 1857, p. 504.

28. It is competent under the Pupils Protection Act to grant special powers of leasing to a tutor-at-law. Fraser, June 9, 1857, p. 801.

29. Circumstances in which leasing powers refused. Fraser, June 9, 1857, p. 801.

30. Circumstances in which leasing powers granted. Fotheringham, July 10, 1857, p. 964.

31. Question, Whether a factor loco tutoris can only get quit of his office on cause shewn to the satisfaction of the Court? Circumstances in which held that cause was shewn. M'Ewan, June 27, 1857, p. 936.

JURISDICTION.

1. Opinion that Justices of the Peace have no power to grant commissions for taking proofs, and that proof ought to be taken before the Justices who adjudicate in the case. Scott, Dec. 2, 1856, p. 119.

2. Circumstances in which the Master of the Rolls having pronounced an order "to deposit in the Record and Will Office all the title-deeds, muniments, and documents," in the possession of testamentary trustees, in Scotland. Interdict granted against most of the deeds being removed beyond the jurisdiction of the Court, reserving right to apply for exhibition of them in the English proceedings. Maclachlan, July 9, 1857, p. 960.

See Bankruptcy, 6.

LEASE. Constitution.

1. Communings between landlord and tenant, which held not to have resulted in a contract of lease, which, though informal, could be validated by rei interventus, and therefore interdict granted against the tenant taking possession. Fraser, Feb. 10, 1857, p. 401.
2. Possession of a farm followed in terms of a signed jotting. Held that the tenant, averring that the jotting produced in an action against him for the rent, was not the one he signed, but was fabricated, must undertake improbation. Williamson, Feb. 13, 1857, p. 443.

See Judicial Factor, 17, 28, 29, 30—Proof, 2.

Mutual Rights of Landlord and Tenant.

3. Subjects let having been altered, the Court refused to ordain them to be restored to their original state; interdict against making "any farther alterations" also refused. Stirling, Feb. 26, 1857, p. 568.
4. The proprietor of a coalwork possessed a canal and paid rent until decerned to remove, and found liable for violent profits in an action at the instance of the proprietor on whose lands it was constructed, which did not conclude for decerniture to have the ground left arable. The proprietor of the coalwork continued to occupy, and paid as rent the sum fixed as due per annum for violent profits,—Held, that he was not bound on ceding possession to make the ground fit for agricultural purposes. Steuart, July 17, 1857, p. 1076.
5. By a lease, written by the landlord, land was let for twenty years, a specified portion to be improved by the end of the lease, under a penalty. Of same date, two additions were made to it. By the first, he let the land to the tenant's son at the expiry of the twenty years, and by the second he let to the father "his liferent," and then to the son "after his death,"—Held that the penalty was not exigible at the expiry of the twenty years, nor till the death of the father. Gillanders, Dec. 2, 1856, p. 116.

Assignment—Sub-lease—Succession.

6. A farm was let to two tenants, and the survivor of them, and the heirs of such survivor. The tenants divided the farm, and each paid the rents and burdens effeiring to his half. One assigned his right to a nephew, and soon after died. The other held entitled to vindicate his right as sole tenant. Robertson, Mar. 10, 1857, p. 667.
7. Construction of a clause of destination in a lease. Duff, Mar. 11, 1857, p. 713.
8. In a removing as against a sub-tenant. Terms of lease under which proof was allowed, whether houses possessed by the defender were excluded from the pursuer's lease. Ritchie, July 3, 1857, p. 949.

Questions with Singular Successors and Executors.

9. Circumstances in which, held, that at the expiry of his lease a tenant on an entailed estate had a good claim for meliorations against the executors of the heir of entail who had granted the lease. Runcie, July 10, 1857, p. 965.
10. A landlord died during the currency of a lease, which bound him, his heirs and successors, at its expiry, to repay the tenant for buildings,—Held, that the tenant's claim transmitted against the landlord's general representatives. Walker, July 18, 1857, p. 1099.

Removing.

11. A summary complaint for removing is competent, if it describe the nature of the tenancy with accuracy, although not in the precise terms of the schedule annexed to the statute. Shotts Iron Company, May 28, 1857, p. 755.
12. A landlord who had right to put an end to a lease by giving notice, gave notice, but did not follow it up by a removing;—Held, that this had not exhausted his power, so as to prevent his some years afterwards giving notice and removing the tenant before the ish in the lease. Granger, July 16, 1857, p. 1010.

See Interdict, 2, 3—Minor—Process, 40, 42, 72—Proof, 2—Repetition, 2—Re-compense.

LEGACY DUTY. See Domicile.

LUNATIC. See Judicial Factor.

MASTER AND SERVANT. Master's Liability.

1. A master is liable in damages to the representatives of a servant who died of injuries received in his service through the carelessness of a fellow-servant. M'Naughton, Jan. 15, 1857, p. 271.

MASTER AND SERVANT—Continued.

2. An action of damages by a labourer against his employer for injury received by the fall of scaffolding, on the allegation that the scaffolding was insufficient, as had been pointed out to the defender's manager;—Held relevant to go to issue. Lynch, Feb. 7, 1857, p. 399, and Feb. 28, 1857, p. 593.

3. A workman who, on the order of an overseer, to do what is clearly beyond the limits of his work, and exposes himself to danger, has no claim against his master for injuries so received. Sutherland, July 15, 1857, p. 1004.

See Property, 2—Reparation, 7, 8.

MINOR.

Two clergymen appointed tutors-dative to a pupil heir-at-law, and another clergyman appointed tutor-dative to the younger children, under the Act 19 & 20 Vict. c. 96. Wilson, Jan. 22, 1857, p. 286.

See Judicial Factor, 9, 14, 15, 17—Trust, 1, 4.

MORA.

A party resident in America held not barred by mora from taking up a lease, although fourteen years had elapsed after her father's death. Duff, March 11, 1857, p. 713.

OBLIGATION.

1. Iron scrip-note;—Held (1.) invalid in the hands of a third party; but, (2.) that by virtue of correspondence between the third party and the iron-master, the latter became liable to deliver the iron to the third party. Dixon, July 29, 1856, p. 9.

2. A proprietor of lands sold to joint purchasers, under burden of an heritable bond. The purchasers only paid the balance of the price. The seller assigned to the bondholder his right of relief against the purchasers, who, on the bondholder bringing the subjects to sale, and not realising the amount of the debt, were held jointly and severally liable for the balance. Reid, Jan. 13, 1857, p. 265.

3. The advance of the money, on the faith of an improbative bond of caution, held to constitute sufficient rei interventus to make the bond obligatory. Church of England Assurance Company, July 17, 1857, p. 1079.

4. 1. A party granting a deed in error is entitled to reduce it, although he is liable to be compelled by legal process to grant a deed in similar terms. 2. A party granting a discharge which he believes to include "all his claims," is entitled to reduce it, on its turning out that there were at the time competent to him claims of which he knew nothing. Purdon, Dec. 19, 1856, p. 206.

PARENT AND CHILD.

1. Provisions under a marriage-contract were to be accepted by the "children of the marriage in full satisfaction" of their rights of legitim;—Held, that the word "children" applied to the heir. Keith's Trustees, July 17, 1857, p. 1040.

2. Terms of an English marriage-contract, which held not to import a discharge of legitim. Keith's Trustees, July 17, 1857, p. 1041.

3. A child is not entitled to defer election between legitim and provisions under a settlement, because the latter are contingent. Keith's Trustees, July 17, 1857, p. 1040.

4. Circumstances in which a person born before the marriage of his mother held proved to be the son of her husband, although she had emitted a declaration of his illegitimacy. Walker, Jan. 23, 1857, p. 290.

See Process, 41—Proof, 4—Succession, 6.

PARTNERSHIP.

1. A committee of the projectors of a railway agreed to erect a quay, &c., the agreement was not embodied in the Act. Held, that the company was not bound to apply their funds to a purpose not sanctioned by the statute. Caledonian Railway Company, H. L., June 19, 1856, p. 6.

2. Individual members of a provisional committee for promoting a railway do not incur a conjunct and several liability for the remuneration of the secretary of the committee. M'Ewan, Feb. 19, 1857, H. L., p. 12.

PARTNERSHIP—Continued.

3. The contract of copartnery of joint-stock company managed by trustees provided for dissolution, but did not contemplate a deficiency in the capital to meet debts. The company having been dissolved, there being such a deficiency, the trustees made a call, which exceeded the amount of stock not paid up;—Held, that the call being in excess of the terms of the contract, the trustees had no title to sue for payment. Barclay, Feb. 19, 1857, p. 488.
4. A judicial factor appointed of consent on a joint adventure, with power to wind up and sell the whole property, or carry on the business. Bell, March 11, 1857, p. 704.

See Trust, 5.

PLEDGE. See Retention, 2.

POOR. Settlement.

1. Circumstances in which held, that parochial relief given to a party not a proper object of relief, had not the effect of preventing his acquiring a residential settlement;—Question, whether relief given by an inspector, within a few days of the completion of a five years' residence, could amount to statutory relief? Porteous, Dec. 16, 1856, p. 181.
2. The inspector of the parish of settlement of a pauper having, in reply to inquiries respecting the pauper, written to the inspector of the parish where he resided, inter alia,—"You should either send her to the House of Refuge, or offer to take her into your workhouse, of course at our expense,"—held, that this amounted to a contract, which attached liability, superseded the necessity of statutory notice; and, 2d, that it was as much the duty of the parish of settlement to inquire whether, as of the other parish to intimate that the authority had been acted on. Hay, Dec. 19, 1856, p. 200.
3. The burden of supporting a pauper lunatic in pupillarity, whose father is alive, but has no settlement except in the parish of his birth, falls upon the parish of the father's birth. Hay, Jan. 29, 1857, p. 332.

Assessment.

4. In imposing assessment under the Poor-Law Act, rent stated in a bona fide lease is the criterion of the value of the lands, and deductions in favour of the tenant in respect of expenditure by him on the lands are not proof of the rent being less than the annual value. Russell, Jan. 28, 1857, p. 326.

POOR'S ROLL.

1. After a favourable report on the probabilis causa, the Court remitted to the kirk-session to supply the usual certificate, which had been omitted. Halket, June 23, 1857, p. 877.
2. A pursuer averred in his condescendence that he was in good circumstances. An after application for the benefit of the poor's roll was refused. Innes, July 18, 1857, p. 1096.

See Process, 92.

PRESCRIPTION.

Trustees directed to invest free residue in land, to be entailed, with concurrence of the beneficiaries at the time, purchased an estate, the price of which exceeded the amount of the trust-funds. More than forty years after payment of part of the price, but not forty years after the completion of the transaction, the heir in possession challenged the purchase, as ultra vires, in respect of the excess of the price over the funds. The trust subsisted still;—Held, that the trustees were entitled to plead the negative prescription. Barns, March 5, 1857, p. 626.

PROCESS.

Record—Summons—Relevancy.

1. The relevancy of an action is to be judged of on the original, not on the revised condescendence. M'Ewan, Feb. 19, 1857, H. L. p. 12.
2. Case sent to trial to ascertain the facts before judgment on relevancy. Gillespie, June 26, 1857, p. 897. Earl of Galloway, June 20, 1857, p. 865.
3. After decree of preference in a multiplepinding in favour of the next of kin, on the footing that a deceased died intestate;—Held, that parties who had been called in the multiplepinding, were entitled, without reducing the decree of preference, and without paying the expenses incurred in the multiplepointing, to insist in declarator, that by certain testamentary writings a valid bequest was made in their favour. Magistrates of Dundee, Dec. 14, 1856, p. 168.

PROCESS—Continued.

Amendment.

4. The record having been closed, and issues lodged, held incompetent to amend the libel so as to correct an essential error. Messer, March 7, 1857, p. 664.
5. Leave to amend a closed record refused, where the alleged error was said to affect only the accuracy of statement and not the essence of the case. Halliday, July 18, 1857, p. 1094.

Execution.

6. The Court refused to grant a warrant to sheriff-officers to execute a decree of the Court of Session against a party in Orkney. Miller's Trustees, Dec. 6, 1856, p. 139.

Partibus.

7. The partibus, and not the entry in the rolls, determines the Division of the Court to which a case belongs. Mason, Nov. 18, 1856, p. 52.
8. The partibus of a summons having erroneously designed the defenders, held that the calling and enrolling were irregular. Keddie, Nov. 14, 1856, p. 41.

Defences.

9. Pending an action against a brother and sister, the brother died; the sister's agent paid the claim, and took an assignation of the decree in his own favour. Action at the instance of the brother's executor against the sister and her agent, concluding for declarator that the money paid was a part of the brother's estate; that the sums assigned belonged to the pursuer, and that the assignee should "deliver" the decree to him;—Held competent without a reduction of the assignation. Issues adjusted to try the cause. Anstruther, March 10, 1857, p. 674.
10. A general plea by a defender striking at the pursuer's title can apply only to objections specified and given notice of on record. North British Railway Company, June 12, 1857, p. 840.
11. In an advocacy, a plea stated at the bar for the first time, and not raised even in a note of additional pleas in law lodged in the Court of Session, held to be excluded. Ralston, June 23, 1857, p. 878.
12. After a proof and production of partial excerpts from the pursuer's books, held incompetent to refer to these excerpts, as establishing a plea which had not been stated before the proof. Ralston, June 23, 1857, p. 878.

Parties.

13. In an action of count and reckoning against the representatives of a party alleged to have been sole executrix, the plea that there were co-executors whose representatives ought also to have been called, but were not, in respect all claim against them was extinguished by the negative prescription,—Repelled, so far as insisted in as preliminary. Burt, Dec. 18, 1856, p. 196.
14. A tenant at the expiry of his lease pursued the trustee and executor of his late landlord, who had died a few years before, for meliorations,—Held unnecessary to call the landlord in possession at the date of the expiry of the lease. Cumine, Nov. 26, 1856, p. 97.
15. In a reduction of an agreement that a sum of money should be dealt with as moveable, on the ground of misrepresentation and essential error as to the nature of the fund,—Preliminary plea, that the sum was truly moveable, reserved, on the ground that that question could only arise if the pursuer should succeed in his reduction. Johnston, March 11, 1857, p. 706.

II. PROOF. Production.

16. Production of a letter addressed to, and admittedly all along in the possession of the defender in an action, allowed to be made in the course of the defender's proof, as necessary to meet a point made for the first time in the course of the pursuer's proof. Irvine, Jan. 17, 1857, p. 248.
17. A record being closed, the defenders under a diligence recovered documents, and produced them, to cut down the title of the pursuer;—Held, that to meet these the pursuers were entitled to produce a sasine in their favour all along in their own possession. North British Railway Company, June 12, 1857, p. 840.

PARTNERSHIP—Continued.

3. The contract of copartnery of joint-stock company managed by trustees provided for dissolution, but did not contemplate a deficiency in the capital to meet debts. The company having been dissolved, there being such a deficiency, the trustees made a call, which exceeded the amount of stock not paid up;—Held, that the call being in excess of the terms of the contract, the trustees had no title to sue for payment. Barclay, Feb. 19, 1857, p. 488.
 4. A judicial factor appointed of consent on a joint adventure, with power to wind up and sell the whole property, or carry on the business. Bell, March 11, 1857, p. 704.
- See Trust, 5.

PLEDGE. See Retention, 2.

POOR. Settlement.

1. Circumstances in which held, that parochial relief given to a party not a proper object of relief, had not the effect of preventing his acquiring a residential settlement;—Question, whether relief given by an inspector, within a few days of the completion of a five years' residence, could amount to statutory relief? Porteous, Dec. 16, 1856, p. 181.
2. The inspector of the parish of settlement of a pauper having, in reply to inquiries respecting the pauper, written to the inspector of the parish where he resided, inter alia,—"You should either send her to the House of Refuge, or offer to take her into your workhouse, of course at our expense,"—held, that this amounted to a contract, which attached liability, superseded the necessity of statutory notice; and, 2d, that it was as much the duty of the parish of settlement to inquire whether, as of the other parish to intimate that the authority had been acted on. Hay, Dec. 19, 1856, p. 200.
3. The burden of supporting a pauper lunatic in pupillarity, whose father is alive, but has no settlement except in the parish of his birth, falls upon the parish of the father's birth. Hay, Jan. 29, 1857, p. 332.

Assessment.

4. In imposing assessment under the Poor-Law Act, rent stated in a bona fide lease is the criterion of the value of the lands, and deductions in favour of the tenant in respect of expenditure by him on the lands are not proof of the rent being less than the annual value. Russell, Jan. 28, 1857, p. 326.

POOR'S ROLL.

1. After a favourable report on the probabilis causa, the Court remitted to the kirk-session to supply the usual certificate, which had been omitted. Halket, June 23, 1857, p. 877.
2. A pursuer averred in his condescendence that he was in good circumstances. An after application for the benefit of the poor's roll was refused. Innes, July 18, 1857, p. 1096.

See Process, 92.

PRESCRIPTION.

Trustees directed to invest free residue in land, to be entailed, with concurrence of the beneficiaries at the time, purchased an estate, the price of which exceeded the amount of the trust-funds. More than forty years after payment of part of the price, but not forty years after the completion of the transaction, the heir in possession challenged the purchase, as ultra vires, in respect of the excess of the price over the funds. The trust subsisted still;—Held, that the trustees were entitled to plead the negative prescription. Barns, March 5, 1857, p. 626.

PROCESS.

Record—Summons—Relevancy.

1. The relevancy of an action is to be judged of on the original, not on the revised condescendence. M'Ewan, Feb. 19, 1857, H. L. p. 12.
2. Case sent to trial to ascertain the facts before judgment on relevancy. Gillespie, June 26, 1857, p. 897. Earl of Galloway, June 20, 1857, p. 865.
3. After decree of preference in a multiplepinding in favour of the next of kin, on the footing that a deceased died intestate;—Held, that parties who had been called in the multiplepinding, were entitled, without reducing the decree of preference, and without paying the expenses incurred in the multiple pointing, to insist in declarator, that by certain testamentary writings a valid bequest was made in their favour. Magistrates of Dundee, Dec. 14, 1856, p. 168.

ESS—Continued.

Amendment.

The record having been closed, and issues lodged, held incompetent to amend the libel so as to correct an essential error. Messer, March 7, 1857, p. 664.
Leave to amend a closed record refused, where the alleged error was said to affect only the accuracy of statement and not the essence of the case. Halliday, July 18, 1857, p. 1094.

Execution.

The Court refused to grant a warrant to sheriff-officers to execute a decree of the Court of Session against a party in Orkney. Miller's Trustees, Dec. 6, 1856, p. 139.

Partibus.

The partibus, and not the entry in the rolls, determines the Division of the Court to which a case belongs. Mason, Nov. 18, 1856, p. 52.

The partibus of a summons having erroneously designed the defenders, held that the calling and enrolling were irregular. Keddie, Nov. 14, 1856, p. 41.

Defences.

Pending an action against a brother and sister, the brother died; the sister's agent paid the claim, and took an assignation of the decree in his own favour. Action at the instance of the brother's executor against the sister and her agent, concluding for declarator that the money paid was a part of the brother's estate; that the sums assigned belonged to the pursuer, and that the assignee should "deliver" the decree to him;—Held competent without a reduction of the assignation. Issues adjusted to try the cause. Anstruther, March 10, 1857, p. 674.

A general plea by a defender striking at the pursuer's title can apply only to objections specified and given notice of on record. North British Railway Company, June 12, 1857, p. 840.

An advocacy, a plea stated at the bar for the first time, and not raised even by a note of additional pleas in law lodged in the Court of Session, held to be excluded. Ralston, June 23, 1857, p. 878.

After a proof and production of partial excerpts from the pursuer's books, held incompetent to refer to these excerpts, as establishing a plea which had not been stated before the proof. Ralston, June 23, 1857, p. 878.

Defences.

In an action of count and reckoning against the representatives of a party alleged to have been sole executrix, the plea that there were co-executors whose representatives ought also to have been called, but were not, in respect of claim against them was extinguished by the negative prescription,—repelled, so far as insisted in as preliminary. Burt, Dec. 18, 1856, p. 196.

A tenant at the expiry of his lease pursued the trustee and executor of his late landlord, who had died a few years before, for meliorations,—Held unnecessary to call the landlord in possession at the date of the expiry of the lease. Umine, Nov. 26, 1856, p. 97.

A reduction of an agreement that a sum of money should be dealt with as moveable, on the ground of misrepresentation and essential error as to the nature of the fund,—Preliminary plea, that the sum was truly moveable, served, on the ground that that question could only arise if the pursuer could succeed in his reduction. Johnston, March 11, 1857, p. 706.

PROOF. Production.

Production of a letter addressed to, and admittedly all along in the possession of the defender in an action, allowed to be made in the course of the defender's proof, as necessary to meet a point made for the first time in the course of the pursuer's proof. Irvine, Jan. 17, 1857, p. 248.

Record being closed, the defenders under a diligence recovered documents, and produced them, to cut down the title of the pursuer;—Held, that to meet these the pursuers were entitled to produce a sasine in their favour all along their own possession. North British Railway Company, June 12, 1857, p. 840.

PROCESS—Continued.Diligence.

18. In an action on a bill the general defence was, that the sum claimed was not due. After the record was closed, a general diligence craved before debate as to the mode of proof by the defenders for the recovery of documents, many of them not the writ of the pursuer, refused hoc statu, without prejudice to a diligence to recover writ of the pursuer. Paterson, Nov. 13, 1856, p. 37.
19. A specification for recovery of "all ledgers, journals, cash-books, bill-books, and other books, documents, and papers," includes letters, and copies of letters; right to access to books for the purpose of getting excerpts did not entitle a party to make notes and carry them away as his own private property. National Exchange Company, March 11, 1857, p. 689.
20. In an action of damages by a bank director against the writer of a letter inuendoed as representing that the members of the managing committee had been in 1856 guilty of malpractices similar to others in 1846;—Held that the defender was not entitled to a diligence in order to prove the character of the proceedings in 1846, the pursuer's description of them on record being admitted by the defender, or the nature of those in 1856, in mitigation of damages, no issue in justification having been taken; nor, in order to prove provocation, to recover letters which he averred only that he had "reason to believe" had been written by directors of the bank. Blaikie, July 11, 1857, p. 983.
21. Question, Whether a Lord Ordinary who has decided the relevancy of a case can, pending a reclaiming note, grant commission to take evidence to lie in retentis? Swan, July 16, 1857, p. 1015.
22. Circumstances in which a diligence granted on an open record. Currer, July 11, 1857, p. 991.
23. In a reduction of a disposition of property, diligence granted to recover a valuation of the property and a discharge of a bond. Halliday, July 18, 1857, p. 1094.
24. Mode of proof—by Lord Ordinary, jury, or on commission?—There is no absolute rule that cases of deathbed must be tried by jury. Circumstances in which proof by commission granted. Fairholme, Dec. 16, 1856, p. 178.
25. A case being put out for trial, motion to examine a witness by commission, on the ground of illness of his wife, refused. Dobie, Dec. 18, 1856, p. 195.
26. In an action of accounting against a company having office-bearers in Scotland, and doing business in Australia, issues having been adjusted,—Held that there being no evidence abroad to be taken, the proper course was to proceed by jury trial. Wemyss, Feb. 10, 1857, p. 400.
27. An inquiry as to whether an improbativ deed was validated rei interventus, made by proof on commission, and not by proof before the Lord Ordinary on adjusted questions, in which latter case his judgment is final. Church of England Life and Fire Assurance Company, Feb. 12, 1857, p. 414.
28. Questions to be tried before a Lord Ordinary without a jury, ought to be stated specifically, and not by a reference to the record. Buchanan, March 11, 1857, p. 716.
29. Circumstances in which the Court refused to allow the proof in a reduction on the ground of facility, fraud, and circumvention, to be taken on commission. Watt, June 5, 1857, p. 787.
30. Circumstances in which the Court remitted to an accountant before answers, although the pursuer demanded a jury trial. Carron Company, June 27, 1857, p. 932.

ISSUES.

31. An action of count and reckoning in which there were questions of fact apart from the accounting, to be ascertained, sent to a jury—form of issue adjusted. Forbes, July 15, 1857, p. 1008.
32. Form of issues to try the question whether the defenders, in violation of their duty as agents, had purchased shares, which they had advised their clients to sell, knowing they would increase in value. Balfour, Dec. 6, 1856, p. 135.
33. Form of issues to try a question of fraudulent invasion of the copyright of a design registered in terms of the 5 & 6 Vic. cap. 100. Carron Company, Jan. 17, 1857, p. 281.
34. Form of issues adjusted to try a question of alleged contravention of patent for ESS—Continued.

"an improved wheel for carriages of different descriptions." Smith, March 10, 1857, p. 672.

Form of issue adjusted to try a question of interdict and damages founded on an allegation of greatly increased pollution of a stream by the occupier of a superior tenement discharging dye-stuffs, &c., under which held competent for the defender to prove acquiescence. Ewen, Feb. 21, 1857, p. 513.

The defender in an action of damages founded on pollution of a stream is not entitled to put in issue whether other tenants higher up the stream had increased the amount of pollution. Ewen, Feb. 21, 1857, p. 513.

A reduction of the sum in a bond upon the allegation that it was blank when subscribed, and had been improperly filled up with a sum larger than the understanding of parties warranted;—the defence being that the deed had remained in the custody of the pursuer's agent, and was filled up in concert with him in terms of the bargain before delivery. Issues adjusted to try the question. Earl of Buchan, Feb. 25, 1857, p. 551.

A summons containing a wrong description of a subject, an issue in regard to it as "described in the schedule appended," which description was correct, refused. Messer, March 7, 1857, p. 664.

Form of issues adjusted in a reduction of an agreement on the ground of misrepresentation, concealment, and essential error as to the nature of a fund dealt with in the deed. Johnston, March 11, 1857, p. 706.

Issues adjusted to try an action against a tenant for using certain clay in violation of the landlord's reserved rights. The use complained of being under an old lease,—Held competent for the tenant, without taking a counter-sue, to prove usage and acquiescence in order to construe the terms of the lease. Ferguson, June 9, 1857, p. 794.

Held, by the Lord Justice-Clerk, that in an action of assythment by persons claiming to be the widow and children of a deceased, when the defenders did not admit the marriage, incompetent to put in issue and prove before a jury marriage and legitimacy. Lenaghan and Others, July 10, 1857, p. 975.

Form of issues adjusted to try a question of damages for burning heather, where the tenant denied that servants had set it on fire by his orders. Grant, July 11, 1857, p. 992.

Form of issues in a question of damages of a wrongous use of diligence. Robertson, July 16, 1857, p. 1016.

Amendment of an issue allowed after it had been adjusted. A B, July 8, 1857, p. 958.

Held competent to amend an issue by striking out words inserted by inadvertence. Blaikie, July 18, 1857, p. 1095.

Fraud, 1—Master and Servant, 1, 2—Reparation, 2—Repetition, 1—Ship, 2. See also 9.

ice.

The defender giving notice of trial for the first sittings, held not to bar the pursuer from moving the Lord Ordinary to fix a day for trial before himself during the session. Carron Company, Feb. 7, 1857, p. 384.

The pursuer having moved a Lord Ordinary to fix a day for a jury trial, the defender held not entitled to deprive the pursuer of his lead by giving notice of sittings then approaching; therefore notice discharged, but, in the circumstances, trial fixed for the sittings. Halliday, June 27, 1857, p. 929.

ponement.

Jury trial postponed on ground of change of agency for the pursuer, who was incarcerated, and the materials for the trial being considered by the new agent sufficient to enable him to do justice to the case by the day which had been fixed. Scott, Dec. 18, 1856, p. 195.

Postponement on the ground of agent's engagements refused. Blaikie, July 18, 1857, p. 1095.

Agent and Client, 1.

dict.

A jury has no power except of consent to return a verdict, with power to the court to enter it up differently from its original return. Mackenzie, July 29, 1856, H. L. p. 12.

PROCESS—Continued.

51. Where a jury, under direction of the Judge, have endorsed on their verdict a finding on a matter not directly embraced by the issue, this cannot be founded on with a view to a new trial by way of an exception to the Judge's charge, whatever objection there may be to the entering up of the verdict. Purdon, Dec. 19, 1856, p. 206.
52. Verdict, in which an explanation appended to a finding for the pursuers held consistent with the verdict. Gourlay's Trustees, June 6, 1857, p. 789.
53. Question, whether a motion by a defender for absolvitor in respect of a verdict containing an explanation, which ought to have led to a conclusion different from that which the jury arrived at be competent, there being no motion for a new trial. Gourlay's Trustees, June 6, 1857, p. 789.
54. Objections to a verdict on the ground of informality and ambiguity, which re- pelled. Lenaghan, July 10, 1857, p. 975.

See Appeal, 1, 2.

Reference to oath.

55. An action for payment of balance of wages payable weekly was met by a denial that so much as was claimed was due ;—Held that the defender was entitled to a proof pro ut de jure, and was not limited to a proof by the pursuer's oath. Brown, Dec. 6, 1856, p. 137.

Judgment—Decree.

56. An extract-decree adopted the words of the partibus, "against John Ker, residing," &c., but omitted to state the character in which he was called, viz., as "eldest son," &c. Authority granted to insert the words omitted in the extract, and to have the corresponding addition made to the record copy of the decree. M'Kellar, Nov. 12, 1856, p. 34.
57. A conviction under the statutes for the regulation of public-houses in these terms :—"The bailie convicts the said Robert Hill of the offence charged against him ;" Held null. Hill, Nov. 18, 1856, p. 47.
58. A summons concluded against three defenders, conjunctly and severally, from one of whom the pursuer took payment of one-third of the sum sued for, granting him a discharge both of the claim and of the action,—Held competent, on the conclusions being restricted to two-thirds, to pronounce decree against the two others, conjunctly and severally, for that balance. Church of England Assurance Company, July 17, 1857, p. 1079.

Review—Reclaiming Note.

59. Objection to the competency of a reclaiming note in a multiplepoinding, that the claim and pleas of one claimant had not been printed, repelled, it being admitted that this claim had no bearing upon the question in the reclaiming note. Scottish Missionary Society, Nov. 12, 1856, p. 30.
60. A reclaiming note against an interlocutor repelling an objection to the competency of an action does not require to be presented within ten days. Anstruther, March 10, 1857, p. 674.
61. Where in a trial without a jury a Lord Ordinary finds facts not remitted to trial, the Court can recall them. Buchanan, March 11, 1857, p. 716.

(2.) Bill of exceptions.

62. Bill of exception to the refusal of a judge to give the jury a direction which was ambiguous in its terms refused. Callaghan, Nov. 18, 1856, p. 52.

New trial.

63. In a motion for a rule to show cause why there should not be a new trial, in respect that the verdict had been irregularly taken down,—Held that that question could not be entered into, as it did not appear ex facie of the record. Mackenzie, July 29, 1856, H. L. p. 12.
64. Where, to an issue which had two branches, the jury returned a general verdict for the pursuers, a new trial was granted, on the ground that it would have been contrary to evidence to return a verdict for the pursuers on the first branch. Callaghan, Nov. 18, 1856, p. 52.

See 50, 51, 53—Expenses 5—Cessio, 3, 4.

INCIDENTAL PROCEDURE—Prorogation.

65. Where a commission for conjunct proof expired on a box-day in vacation, a subsequent prorogation is incompetent, but the commission may be renewed. Aikman, Jan. 16, 1857, p. 279.

PROCESS—Continued.

Circumduction.

66. Where objections to a witness or to a question are taken and sustained, and an appeal follows, and where the evidence is not taken pending such appeal, but excluded, circumduction ought not to be given till the appeals are disposed of. Rickets or Ritchie, Jan. 20, 1857, p. 285.

Reponing.

67. Decree in respect of no defences, where the summons had been taken out to see, and the cause had been continued on motions by the defenders' counsel, is a decree in absence, not by default. Marjoribanks, Feb. 18, 1857, p. 474.
68. Decree by default having been pronounced against pursuers they were reponed, but after a second decree by default had become final, the Lord Ordinary corrected a clerical error, pronouncing decree of new. The Court refused a reclaiming note as incompetent. Hamilton, March 11, 1857, p. 712.
69. Reponing against decrees by default does not, as against decree in absence, take place as matter of course. M'Laren, May 29, 1857, p. 769.
70. Where a pursuer takes an order to revise and does not do so, the defender is not entitled to take decree by default, but the clerk must transmit the process for adjustment. Norris v. Laing, June 5, 1857, p. 786.

Mandate.

71. In an action by a married woman, and her husband as her administrator, for damages for slander, the husband being a sailor employed in a cruising vessel belonging to Australia,—Held that the defender was not entitled to insist that ante omnia a mandatory should be sisted. Gale, March 7, 1857, p. 665.
72. A person resident abroad brought an action to vindicate right to a lease, sisting a mandatory. Having prevailed,—Held that the mandatory incurred no responsibility as to the management of the farm, and judicial manager appointed by Court. Duff, March 11, 1857, p. 713.
73. A litigant is not bound to sist a mandatory if detained furth of Scotland at the instance of his opponent. Robertson, July 14, 1857, p. 996.

Sist.

74. Where the jurisdiction of the Court was undoubted, they refused to sist an action that the same question might be tried in Chancery, as the most convenient forum, in proceedings instituted by the defenders, who were resident in England, the English Courts having refused an injunction against the proceedings in Scotland. Carron Company, Jan. 27, 1857, p. 318.

Compearance.

75. Trustees of a deceased heir of entail who had compeared in a process but had not reclaimed against an Outer House interlocutor, are not entitled to compear in the Inner House. Scott, May 29, 1857, p. 769.

Remits.

76. It is incompetent even of consent to remit a case from one Division to the other where contingency is not averred. Robson, March 6, 1857, p. 654.

Consignation.

77. Circumstances in which the Court refused to order consignation by a trustee of the fund in medio in a process of multiplepinding and exoneration raised by him. Kerr, May 27, 1857, p. 750.

Reporting.

78. It is incompetent for the Lord Ordinary to report a sequestration case by formal interlocutor to the Inner House. Wryghte, Nov. 20, 1856, p. 55.

PARTICULAR ACTION.—Advocation.

79. In advocations, the interlocutors brought under review should be prefixed to the inferior Court proceedings. Porteous, Dec. 16, 1856, p. 181.
80. Section 22 of the recent Sheriff-court Act, cutting off the right of review when the value does not exceed L.25, applies to causes in dependence before the passing of the Act.—Where an action contains a money conclusion under L.25, and an alternative one ad factum præstandum, and where the Sheriff has decreed in terms of the first, the defender cannot advocate when there was clearly no importance in specific performance. Cameron, Feb. 24, 1857, p. 517.
81. A Sheriff-court action may be advocated where, looking to its conclusions, advocation is competent, although no question remained open but that of expenses—held competent. Robertson, Mar. 3, 1857, p. 594.

PROCESS—Continued.

Multiplepinding.

82. A sum subscribed to build a chapel was deposited in bank in name of the pastor and two laymen, as trustees. The congregation split into two parties, each claiming the fund. A multiplepinding held competent, the competing claims amounting in law to double distress. Connell, Feb. 19, 1857, p. 482.
83. Question, whether it be pars judicis to object to the competency of a multiplepinding for want of double distress. Connell, Feb. 19, 1857, p. 482.

Petitions.

84. Procedure under entail petition for authority to grant bonds and dispositions in security where the improvement debt is constituted by a decree of declarator, not yet final, under the Montgomery Act, and the consenting heirs are minors. Johnston, Nov. 21, 1856, p. 68; Stewart, Nov. 21, 1856, p. 69.
85. Alterations allowed in an entail petition. M'Donald, Feb. 21, 1857, p. 506; Kilgour, July 10, 1851, p. 963.
86. Alteration disallowed. Cunninghame, July 14, 1857, p. 993.
See Entail, 14, 15, 16. Judicial Factor, 1, 5, 19, 21, 24.
87. Petition by testamentary trustees for appointment of a judicial factor without intimation, refused,—but intimation ordered, and a remit to Lord Ordinary on the Bills to appoint during vacation. Taylors, July 18, 1857, p. 1097.

Reduction.

88. Question, whether a decree in absence obtained against a defender, on a summons which had been personally served on him, can be opened up by his representatives after his death? and held, that the representatives of a defender were barred from opening up by reduction a decree which he had dealt with as valid. Gillespie, Feb. 18, 1857, p. 475.
89. Averments which held insufficient to support reduction on the ground of force and fear and of fraud. Priestnell, Feb. 20, 1857, p. 496.
90. Averments of essential error as a ground of reduction, which remitted to proof. Priestnell, Feb. 20, 1857, p. 495.
91. Reduction of an assignation bearing to be onerous, on the allegation that it was gratuitous, and in trust only, is incompetent without conclusions declaratory of trust. Anstruther, Mar. 10, 1857, p. 675.
See Deathbed, 1, 2—Fraud, 1, 2—Entail, 1—See also 39.

Suspension.

92. In an advocation on juratory caution, the lawyers for the poor reported that the advocator had no probabilis causa litigandi, but having been imprisoned on the decree in the inferior Court, a note of suspension and liberation was passed on juratory caution. Rodger, Dec. 6, 1856, p. 139.

Proving the Tenor.

93. Mere changing of chambers by an agent is not of itself a sufficient casus amissionis. Circumstances in which the casus amissionis held proved where the deed had not been seen since the dissolution of partnership of a law firm who had the charge of it. M'Kean, Feb. 14, 1857, p. 448.

Division of Commonly.

94. Held, apart from any general question of law, that in the division of a certain commonly, valued rent had been fixed by decree-arbitral to be the rule for allocating the shares. Lord Blantyre, Dec. 13, 1856, p. 167.

See River, 2.

Division and Sale.

95. Is an Outer-House process competent at the instance of one pro indiviso proprietor? Brock, Jan. 27, 1852, p. 701; Anderson, Mar. 11, 1857, p. 700.

Removing.

96. In actions of removing it is not necessary to libel specially on the Act of Parliament; but libelling in a removing on the Act of Sederunt does not exclude the provisions of the Act 16 & 17 Vict. c. 80 as to warning. Granger, July 16, 1857, p. 1010.

See Lease, 11, 12—Property, 1.

PROOF.

Admissibility.

1. In a prosecution before the Justices of the Peace for contravention of an excise statute, where the offence is punishable by a penalty or forfeiture, the accused not a competent witness in his own favour, under the Act 16 Vict. cap. 20, sect. 3. Watson, Feb. 4, 1857, p. 380.
2. Question, whether it be competent to prove that by verbal communings a written stipulation had been abrogated. Granger, July 16, 1857, p. 1010.

Confidentiality.

3. Two actions, involving several parties, referred to the same subject-matter. The pursuer and defender in the first were both called as defenders in the second. This last was at the instance of a public company, and was settled. The defender in the first averred collusively for the purpose of defeating his rights;—Held that he was entitled, in order to prove this allegation, to recover from the agent of the company excerpts from their minutes, and letters between himself as country agent, and his correspondent in Edinburgh, relating to the alleged arrangement. Millar, Dec. 10, 1856, p. 142.

Oath in Supplement.

4. Parties in filiation cases being now admissible as witnesses, when the pursuer tenders herself, she is not entitled to give her oath in supplement, and her evidence is to be weighed by the ordinary rules;—Question, whether the law of semplena has been abrogated? Scott, Dec. 2, 1856, p. 119.

Oath on reference.

5. Oath on reference, by which held that the resting owing was proved. Crichton, March 6, 1857, p. 661.

Onus probandi—Presumption.

6. Creditors raised a declarator that their debtor's jus mariti was not validly excluded by a disposition of heritage, excluding his jus mariti, in favour of his wife, on which nine years' possession had followed;—Held, that there was no presumption that the price was paid from funds forming the communion of goods, so as to shift the onus probandi, and relieve the pursuers from the ordinary obligations to prove their case. Loudoun, Dec. 6, 1856, p. 140.

See Deathbed, 1.

7. There is no absolute rule that the onus of proving that a woman applying for relief for her child is capable of supporting herself and child, is laid upon the parochial board. Laing, May 22, 1857, p. 749.

Competency and Sufficiency.

8. 1. It is incompetent to prove that iron scrip has been issued to the party from whom the holder had purchased, in fulfilment of an obligation to deliver iron of a manufacture not specified on the note; but it is, 2, competent to prove that, according to the usage of the trade, the notes can be said ex facie to mean iron of a kind not specified; 3, as general usage of trade can be proved only by multiplication of particular usages, it is competent to prove that parties dealing with the defenders understood their scrip-notes to imply an obligation to deliver iron of a certain species; although, 4, evidence of such particular course of dealing on the part of the issuers of the scrip could not in law suffice to control the terms of the note. Mackenzie, July 29, 1856, H. L. p. 11.
9. A judgment allowing a letter to be produced and referred to, "so far as sufficiently proved or competent evidence, does not necessarily fix that it shall form part of the party's proof." Irvine, Jan. 17, 1857, p. 284.
10. A pursuer having directed search for a letter which had never been in the possession of her or her agent,—Held entitled to adduce secondary evidence of its contents. Ritchie, Feb. 21, 1857, p. 505.
11. Question, Whether promissory-note not properly stamped may be looked at as evidence of a loan transaction. Pilling, Jan. 30, 1857, p. 938.
12. Question, Can verbal authority to enter into a feu-contract be competently proved by parole? Stewart, July 17, 1857, p. 1071.

See Process, 40.

PROPERTY.

1. A judicial factor on a trust-estate,—one purpose of the trust was to convey to two children, on majority, their proportion of certain heritage,—applied to the Court, on the eldest attaining majority, for authority to divide the heritable subjects, and convey the share to the child who was of age;—Held, incompetent so to divide heritable subjects, but the prayer having been amended, authority to convey the pro indiviso share under the trust-settlement was granted. Watson, Nov. 21, 1856, p. 70.

PROPERTY—Continued.

2. Books in which the draughtsman of an engineering firm made sketches, from which finished drawings were afterwards made, of machinery made by his employers, but which contained no original designs by himself, belong to the employers. Rollo, July 14, 1857, p. 994.

See River, 1—Title to sue, 1.

PUBLIC OFFICER.

In an action of damages for wrongous imprisonment under a police sentence, the statutory limitation of three months within which the action must be brought against a burgh procurator-fiscal applies not to the issuing, but the execution of the warrant complained of. Hill, July 7, 1857, p. 955.

Reparation, 3, 4.

RAILWAY.

1. A committee of the projectors of a railway agreed to erect a quay, &c., in consideration of support to the undertaking. The agreement was not embodied in the Act of Parliament. Held, that the railway company was not bound by the agreement to apply their funds to a purpose not sanctioned by the statute incorporating the company. Caledonian and Dumbartonshire Railway Company, June 19, 1856, p. 6.

2. What is a lawful passenger? Hamilton, Feb. 18, 1857, p. 457.

3. One railway company was bound, by Act of Parliament, to take on lease a line, paying a per centage on the amount actually expended on it. The sum ascertained exceeded the aggregate of the share capital and sums authorised by the Lessors' Act to be borrowed. Objection to pay per centage on the sum, so far as in excess of that aggregate, repelled. Stirling and Dunfermline Railway Company, March 4, 1857, p. 598.

4. A railway company were bound to keep the slopes of all cuttings formed on a certain estate—except where “in rock”—properly soiled and sown;—Held, that the slopes at the top of a rock-cutting were not “in rock.” Lord Blantyre, June 19, 1857, p. 862.

5. A summary petition for interdict and penalties against a railway company for alleged contraventions of the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, which were alleged also to be a contravention of the Traffic Act—the latter Act alone providing for a summary remedy;—Objection, that in so far as the petition was founded on the Railway Clauses Act it was incompetent, repelled. Hosie, Nov. 21, 1856, p. 65.

See Expenses 1.

RECOMPENSE.

A tenant bound to construct an embankment, erected one much more costly and different from what he was bound to do. During the progress of the work he had communings with the landlord;—Held, that these had constituted no obligation to relieve the tenant of any part of his outlay. 2d, That in such circumstances there was no claim for recompense at the instance of the tenant. Grant, Dec. 4, 1856, p. 127.

REPARATION.Wrongous use of diligence.

1. Allegations that in a sequestration for rent the sale was misconducted to injure the tenant, which held relevant to support conclusions for damages against the landlord both for the sacrifice of the property and for solatium. Robertson, July 16, 1857, p. 1016.

Seduction.

2. In an action of damages for seduction it is not necessary to put in issue that the pursuer was previously “a person of virtuous conduct and untainted character. Walker, Jan. 29, 1857, p. 340.

Injuries from negligence of public officers and law-agents.

3. An inhibition not having been duly recorded, was ineffectual, the inhibiting creditor sued the Keeper of the Register of Inhibitions for damages. Que-

REPARATION—Continued.

- tion, Whether it would be a relevant defence that the inhibition, by reason of prior defects, was inoperative and null when presented to be recorded? Davidson, Dec. 20, 1856, p. 226.
4. A police sentence having been suspended, the party sued for damages the informer and an assistant superintendent of police, who, as a joint procurator-fiscal, had presented the complaint in his own name; he called also the principal procurator-fiscal and the superintendent of police. The action was dismissed as irrelevant against the two latter. Bain, Feb. 11, 1857, p. 405.
 5. Action against agent for loss and damage sustained as relevant, the pursuer alleging that diligence against his effects had been carried through owing to the defender's neglect to intimate a sist, and against his person owing to his having sold goods which had been poinded; being induced to disregard the poinding by a letter from the defender, saying that the poinding was illegal, and should be disregarded, and that he, the agent, would guarantee him against the consequences. Anderson, Jan. 31, 1857, p. 357.
 6. In an action against an agent for damages for the loss of an action occasioned by his allowing circumduction and decree by default to pass without intimating to his client an interlocutor allowing proof, it is not necessary to aver fraud or collusion, but evidence which could have been available must be condescended upon. Urquhart, June 12, 1857, p. 853.

Culpa.

7. Action held relevant at the instance of an engine-driver against the Railway Company, on the ground that, while in the execution of his duty his leg was broken from the engine coming in contact with rubbish on the line in the dark, and in a cutting where the line was unfenced. Issues adjusted to try the question. Morris, Feb. 3, 1857, p. 360.
8. Form of issues to try a question of damages in an action against a coalmaster by the family of a miner killed by a fall of a portion of the roof. Cook, Feb. 7, 1857, p. 398.
9. A trustee alleging that he had been so irritated by the improper conduct of co-trustees in the management of the trust that his health was injured and he was unable to attend to his business, which he lost, brought an action of damages against them, which was dismissed as irrelevant. Pridie, Jan. 22, 1857, p. 287.

See Master and servant—Process—Title to sue.

Assessing damages.

10. In an action of damages for loss of a litigation through crassa negligentia on the part of the agent, the conclusions of the action so lost would not, if the case were proved, be the measure of the damage, but the Court would inquire into the soundness of the claim. Urquhart, June 12, 1857, p. 853.

REPETITION.

1. An action founded on the averment that the pursuer paid to a company through their manager certain money, to be invested by them in stock in the Bank of New South Wales; that through their manager they undertook to invest it, and concluding for delivery of transfers, and accounting for profits; or, failing that, for repayment;—Held relevant to be sent to a jury on issues. Wemyss, Dec. 4, 1856, p. 122.
2. A landlord bound to pay a tenant L.65 on his producing vouchers of expenditure on buildings, before they were executed allowed him to retain L.65 out of his rent, on condition that they were proceeded with after the lapse of some time;—Held competent for a landlord to pursue for production of the vouchers or repayment of the L.65. Dods, Jan. 15, 1857, p. 275.
3. A broker instructed to purchase shares on 15th October, of that date notified a purchase to his employer, who, on 6th November, paid the price and got the transfers; in regard to 50 of them, it turned out that they had been purchased on 6th November, and the purchaser was held not bound to register them. The purchaser now sued the broker for repetition of the price of the whole.—Action dismissed, there being no conclusions for reduction of the transaction, nor offer to restore the transfers. Cullen, July 10, 1857, p. 969.

RES JUDICATA.

1. A note of suspension against proceeding with a submission, on the ground that being a common law submission it had fallen by the death of one of the parties, was refused; but in a reduction of the final decree, on the ground that it was a statutory one, and statutory provisions had not been complied with, it was not held res judicata that the submission was not a common law one. Caledonian Railway Co. Feb. 25, 1857, p. 527.
2. In a second action of reduction laid on the same grounds, but averring actual, instead of speculative knowledge of facts, which were said to have been fraudulently concealed from and misrepresented to the pursuer, plea of res judicata repelled. Gillespie, June 20, 1857, p. 897.
3. Two parties pursued by a railway company and their landlord raised against the latter a counter action relative to the same matter. Before the record in the first action was closed the defenders alluded to but did not produce a deed affecting the title of the railway;—Held, that the tenants having afterwards closed the record in first action, were not entitled to add as res noviter averments of the divestiture of the Company. North British Railway Company, June 12, 1857, p. 840.

RES NOVITER.

There is no absolute rule that a recorded deed can in no case be founded on as res noviter Maitland, July 2, 1857, p. 945.

RETENTION.

1. The purchaser from the trustee in a sequestration of the bankrupt's furniture liable to the landlord's hypothec is entitled to retain enough of the price to meet the rent. Mitchell, Nov. 12, 1856, p. 30.
2. A bank having discounted bills, received as collateral security a delivery order, in virtue of which goods in a bonded warehouse were transferred to the name of their manager. Previous to the bills being retired, the bank made additional advances;—Held, that the transaction was not one of pledge, but that there was a transference of proprietary right, under which the bank were entitled to retain the goods until all the advances were repaid. Hamilton, Dec. 13, 1856, p. 152.

See obligation, 1.

REVOCATION. See Testament, 1, 4.

RIGHT IN SECURITY.

A creditor under a bond and disposition in security, containing power to output "posessors," is not entitled, after requisition, to eject a landlord in possession by a summary process of removing before the Sheriff. M'Farlane, March 4, 1857, p. 623.

See Bankruptcy, 15—Retention, 2.

RIVER.

1. Two proprietors had a joint right or common property in a loch;—Held, that one could dispoise part of his lands, and communicate to the dispoisee a common right in the loch; and that the other proprietor had no right to interfere, provided the dispoisee and his author together did not exercise their right of property in the loch beyond the extent to which the dispoisee was entitled to have exercised his right. Menzies, June 10, 1856, H. L. p. 1.
2. Opinion, that there is no reason why co-proprietors of a loch should not have it divided. Menzies, June 10, 1856, H. L. p. 1.
3. An heritor is not entitled during flood-time to divert from the natural channel of a stream the excess of water over the ordinary flow, without returning it. M'Lean, July 15, 1857, p. 1006.
4. Issue adjusted in a claim of damages against a neighbouring proprietor for altering the course of a stream within his own lands, so as to cause injury to the pursuer. Macfarlane, July 17, 1857, p. 1038.
5. Occupiers of superior and inferior tenements on a stream held under leases, each of which contained the same clause, conferring the use of water under certain restrictions. Question, whether this inferred abandonment of rights at common-law, or whether it was to be held as in fortification of them. Ewen, Feb. 21, 1857, p. 513.

See Lease, 4—Process, 36.

ROAD.

A right of way was claimed by the public through the private park of a proprietor, who admitted that at one time it had existed, but alleged that the road had been shut by authority, and a new one opened; he averred that latterly any access had existed only by tolerance. There had always been gates at each end, but such as to permit easy ingress and egress. Locked gates being substituted, the public destroyed them. In an application to the Sheriff for interdict and authority to restore the gates;—Held that the proprietor was entitled to replace gates pending declarator at his instance, but not so as to obstruct access by the public, and interdict granted against all interference with the gates. Kirkpatrick, Nov. 26, 1856, p. 91.

SALE.—Price.

1. A purchaser offered to take delivery of the subject at what he said was the price. This being refused, he wrote, declining to take the goods. In an action for implement of the sale raised on the other view of the price, a minute, tendering delivery at the price alleged by the purchaser, was put in; Held that the purchaser had been entitled to annul the contract. Anderson, Nov. 13, 1856, p. 39.

Delivery.

2. Under a contract of sale of iron, the terms of payment being "Cash in London on 23d November, in exchange for storekeeper's warrants," presentment not having been made till the 24th November, although intimation was given on the 23d that the warrants had reached London, the contract was held not binding. Colvin, June 26, 1857, p. 890.

Warrandice.

3. A proprietor sold land for a railway, reserving the minerals and liberty to work them. When he proposed to exercise this right, held that he was neither entitled to work the minerals nor to compensation for their loss, as conveyance of surface implied right to adequate subjacent and adjacent support. Caledonian Railway Company, June 16, 1856, H. L. p. 3. Caledonian Railway Company, June 5, 1857, H. L. p. 5.
 4. A railway company introduced a bill to enable them to make a branch. To obtain the assent of a proprietor, they agreed "to acquire the whole ground" belonging to him at a price fixed, when they, "on obtaining their Act of Parliament, shall have begun to execute any part of the said railway." Held that the execution of the railway was a condition of the purchase. Philip, Feb. 23, 1857, H. L. p. 13.
- See Bankruptcy, 10, 11.

SASINE. See Title to Sue, 1.

SHERIFF. See Service—Right in Security—Expences, 4—Process, 80, 81.

SERVICE.

Form of procedure. When the Sheriff's judgment in competing claims for service is adhered to by the Court of Session, but on different grounds. Walker, Jan. 23, 1857, p. 290.

SERVITUDE. See Interdict, 3.

SHIP.

1. A certificate of registry is prima facie evidence of title to a ship. Arrestments used by creditors of the former owners recalled, although the transfer to the registered owners was averred to be fraudulent. Duffus, Feb. 13, 1857, p. 430.
2. Form of issues in an action for freight resisted on the ground of damage to the cargo in consequence of the leaky and unseaworthy condition of the vessel, and of delay and fault on the part of the pursuer. Young, June 4, 1857, p. 785.

STAMP. See Proof, 11.

STATUTES.

1469, c. 28. See Prescription, 2.—1474, c. 54. See Prescription, 2.—1584, c. 3. See Proof.—1617, c. 12. See Prescription.—1681, c. 5. See Writ, 1.—4 Geo. II. c. 21. See Alien.—10 Geo. III. c. 5. See Process.—13 Geo. III. c. 21. See Alien.—39 & 40 Geo. III. c. 98. See Succession, 7.—58 Geo. III. c. 121. See Process.—6 Geo. IV. c. 120. See Inhibition, 4—Process

STATUTES—Continued.

—Service.—7 Geo. IV. c. 103. See Sale, 3.—9 Geo. IV. c. 58. See Process—Public Officer, 2.—3 & 4 Wil. IV. c. 76. See Burgh, 1.—6 & 7 Will. IV. c. 56. See Cessio, 3.—1 & 2 Vict. c. 114. See Diligence.—1 & 2 Vict. c. 118. See Process.—2 & 3 Vict. c. 41. See Bankruptcy, 2, 14, 19.—5 & 6 Vict. c. 100. See Exclusive Privilege, 1.—Process, 33.—8 & 9 Vict. c. 19. See Expenses, 1.—Sale, 3.—8 & 9 Vict. c. 33. See Sale, 3.—Process.—8 & 9 Vict. c. 73. See Poor, 1, 2.—8 & 9 Vict. c. 83. See Railway.—9 & 10 Vict. c. 289. See Burgh, 2.—Reparation, 4.—9 & 10 Vict. c. 329. See Sale.—10 & 11 Vict. c. 47. See Service.—11 & 12 Vict. c. 36. See Process—Entail, 6, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 19.—Succession, 7.—11 & 12 Vict. c. 45. See Bankruptcy, 3.—12 & 13 Vict. c. 51. See Judicial Factor.—12 & 13 Vict. c. 108. See Bankruptcy, 3.—13 & 14 Vict. c. 36. See Process, 46.—13 & 14 Vict. c. 36. See Process.—15 & 16 Vict. c. 83. See Exclusive privilege, 1.—16 Vict. c. 20. See Proof, 1, 4.—16 & 17 Vict. c. 53. See Bankruptcy, 19, 20.—16 & 17 Vict. c. 67. See Process—Public Officer.—16 & 17 Vict. c. 80. See Process, 95.—16 & 17 Vict. c. 96.—Entail—Process.—17 & 18 Vict. c. 31. See Process.—17 & 18 Vict. c. 104. See Ship 1.—19 & 20 Vict. c. 60. See Cautioner.—19 & 20 Vict. c. 79. See Bankruptcy, 1, 3, 4, 6, 8, 19, 20.—19 & 20 Vict. c. 96. See Minor.

SUCCESSION. Competition among heirs.

1. An eldest heir-portioner is not entitled to take, as præcipuum, a house which had not been treated as the mansion-house by the proprietor to whom the heirs-portioners succeed. Halbert, May 28, 1857, p. 762.

Construction of Settlement.

2. A truster destined, in the event of his leaving no children, his heritage to his widow in liferent, and B in fee. He thereafter died leaving no issue. Terms of trust-deed under which, held that B had succeeded so as not to be entitled to a legacy payable to the said B, in the event of his not succeeding to the estate. Ewing, June 12, 1857, p. 835.
3. On the construction of a trust-deed, held that on the death of the institute without issue, the whole residue of the trust-estate went to an heir-female, not to the institute's representatives. Cuming, July 15, 1856, H. L. p. 7.
4. Form of trust-deed under which, held that accumulations of annual proceeds, including interest and bonuses on bank stock during the institute's minority, did not fall under the term residue, but had vested in the institute, and went to his representatives. Cuming, July 15, 1856, H. L. p. 7.
5. Trustees were directed to hold the truster's whole estate for payment of the liferent to his widow, and "on the termination of her liferent," to dispoise certain portions to each of the three sons of the truster nominatim, and to divide the residue among them equally, the share of any son predeceasing the truster and his spouse to go to his issue, or failing such issue, to the surviving son or sons equally, or their issue. The two eldest sons died unmarried;—Held that the provisions to the sons had vested a morte testatoris, and the trustees were bound, on the widow executing a renunciation of her liferent, to convey the whole estate to the surviving son. Foulis, Feb. 3, 1857, p. 362.

Collation.

6. Collation is a right inter liberos, and cannot be demanded by testamentary trustees. Keith, July 17, 1857, p. 1040.

Intestacy.

7. Held that directions for accumulating the rents of heritable property in Scotland by a truster who died before 1823, were not affected by the Thellusson Act, or the Entail Amendment Act (11 & 12 Vict. c. 36). That so far as accumulations of the rents of heritable property in England, and of moveables, had been made contrary to the provisions of the former Act, they were to be treated as intestate succession. Keith's Trustees, July 17, 1857, p. 1040.

See Bankruptcy, 21.

SUPERIOR AND VASSAL.

1. In an action by a superior against feuars for a yearly payment under their feu-contracts, for the use of certain roads and bridges, proof allowed before answer of the practice since the date of the feu-contracts. Kerr, Jan. 28, 1857, p. 322.

SUPERIOR AND VASSAL—Continued.

2. A superior agreed to feu land, reserving the minerals,—held that he was not bound to insert in the feu-contract an obligation to support the roof, or pay damages in the event of failure to do so. Steuart, July 17, 1857, p. 1071.

TESTAMENT. Bequest.

1. On a review of a series of holograph testamentary writings portions of which had been scored out, though still legible,—Held that the Court were not entitled, in order to make a bequest intelligible, to restore the word "Hospital" so scored out. Magistrates of Dundee, June 26, 1857, p. 918.
2. Question, whether the expression of a "wish" to found an hospital would form an obligation on next of kin taking as ab intestato to found an hospital. Magistrates of Dundee, June 26, 1857, p. 918.

Residue.

3. The income of a trust-estate more than satisfied the legacies and annuities provided by the truster. The period of the vesting of the residue was postponed. The deed gave no direction as to accumulations;—Held that they formed part of the residue, and could not be claimed by the truster's next of kin as ab intestato. Pursell, Nov. 25, 1856, p. 71.
4. A bequest was made to A in liferent, and her children in fee, &c. The testator in a codicil said, "I reverse that clause," and gave A the sole and ultimate disposal of the sum in the bequest. A having died intestate, held that a mere faculty of testing had been conferred on A, but that as it had not been exercised, the sum became residue. Pursell, Nov. 25, 1856, p. 71.

TITLE TO SUE.

1. The pursuer of an action of declarator of right to a stream alleged possession of the ground adjoining. After raising the action he completed his title by infestment;—title to sue sustained. Welsh, Feb. 11, 1857, p. 404.
2. A banking company is entitled to sue for damages for slander without averring malice or intent to injure, if an inuendo sufficiently fix the slander as directed against the corporate body. North of Scotland Banking Company, June 25, 1857, p. 881.

See Bankruptcy—Executor—Partnership.

TRUST.

1. A complaint by the beneficiaries under a trust-settlement, that they had been abandoned to destitution, and alleging specific acts of mismanagement, held not sufficient grounds for the removal of the trustees. Taylors, July 18, 1857, p. 1097.
2. A private estate Act was obtained by trustees, one of whom was a partner of a law firm, which both before and after conducted the business of the trust. The account of the firm was approved of by the trustees, and by the heir in possession;—Held, that a trustee is not entitled to transact the business of the trust-estate under his charge, or to employ a firm, of which he is a partner, to do so; and that his or his firm's right to payment therefor is null, and not merely voidable. Lord Gray, Nov. 12, 1856, p. 1. Wellwoods' Trustees, Dec. 17, 1856, p. 187.
3. A trustee who acted as factor, mixed up the trust-funds with his own, held liable in interest at 4 per cent, but entitled to bank interest on advances. Wellwood's Trustees, Dec. 17, 1856, p. 187.
4. Circumstances in which trustees held not liable for funds belonging to a pupil and minor, which had been misapplied by a factor for them, to whom the trustees had paid on caution. Stevenson's Trustees, Feb. 18, 1857, p. 462.
5. In ascertaining the amount of profits made on trust-funds improperly invested by trustees in their partnership business, there must be taken into account, not only input capital of partners, but all other funds obtained on loan, or otherwise, and invested in the partnership business; and that the proportion which the trust-mones bore to the whole funds so employed regulates the share of profits to be made over to the beneficiaries under the trust,—periodical docquets fixing the interests of the partners inter se being of no importance. Cochrane, July 16, 1857, p. 1019.
6. A summons concluding for payment of an account against the members of a TRUST—Continued.

- committee, as such, dismissed, the pursuer having admitted judicially that the committee had no funds. Spence, Jan. 30, 1857, p. 341.
7. Estates were directed to be entailed upon the truster's granddaughter on her marriage or majority, but in the event of her marriage without the approbation of the trustees, her interest in the estates was to cease. The granddaughter having married without the consent, held that subsequent consent averted the forfeiture. Wellwood's Trustees, Dec. 17, 1856, p. 187.
 8. Circumstances in which, held that trustees rightly expended the rents of an estate in improving a farm-steading, the rents being claimed as part of the residuary estate. Wellwood's Trustees, Dec. 17, 1856, p. 187.
 9. Where a trust directs an entail to be executed, and the expense paid out of the trust-funds, the institute is not entitled to the expense of employing an agent to look into the titles. Wellwood's Trustees, Dec. 17, 1856, p. 187.
 10. A truster conveyed his estate to trustees, for payment of the annual income to his widow, and, after her decease, to his daughter—an only child—during her lifetime, but exclusive of the jus mariti, which provision was declared to be in full of all her legal claims: And he directed his trustees to make over the trust-estate to "his own nearest heirs," after the death of the longest liver of himself, his wife, and daughter. After the widow's death, held (1), that the fee of the estate was vested in the daughter; but (2), that the trust was nevertheless to be kept up during the daughter's lifetime, in order to secure her in the liferent exclusive of the jus mariti. Balderston, Jan. 23, 1857, p. 293.
- See Partnership, 3—Prescription, 1—Process, 31—Succession, 2.

WRIT.

1. A cautionary obligation having been executed in Scotland by the debtor and the cautioners, also Scotch, in the English form;—Opinion that the cautioners' acknowledgment of their subscription did not per se obviate the objection to the deed as improbativ. Church of England Fire and Life Assurance Company, Feb. 12, 1857, p. 414.
 2. Question, Whether pencil writing is entitled to be viewed as favourably as writing in ink? Williamson, Feb. 13, 1857, p. 443.
 3. In a codicil altering a settlement, thirty-one words were written on an erasure, interjected between two clauses which were complete, and afforded no clue to what had been erased. In a reduction by the beneficiaries under the settlement,—Held that the erasure was not in essentialibus. Question, had the codicil been reduced, could the settlement stand? Peddie, June 12, 1857, p. 820.
- See Bankruptcy, 13—Process, 37.

